PREFACE TO THE EPISTLES IN GENERAL, TO
ST. PAUL'S EPISTLES, AND TO THE
EPISTLE TO THE ROMANS.

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE ROMANS.

We now enter upon the epistolary part of the New Testament, concerning which it may be profitable to make some previous remarks. The epistles are letters, written either to individuals, or to particular churches, or to several churches; or they are catholic epistles, that is, circular letters to the churches in general. It is supposed, that they were all written by one or other of the apostles; and, excepting the epistle to the Hebrews, and the epistles ascribed to John, each has the name of an apostle prefixed to it. The apostle Paul's name is affixed to thirteen of them, and the epistle to the Hebrews has generally been ascribed to him: that of Peter to two; those of James, John, and Jude, to one, each. Now, if they were actually written by the apostles, what shadow of reason can there be in the opinion, which numbers maintain, that they are not to be considered as of equal authority with the Gospels? The Gospels, indeed, record the words and actions of Christ; but the human testimony, by which these words and actions were recorded, might even be thought inferior to that of the epistles, for neither Mark nor Luke were apostles; and we have as full proof that the epistles were divinely inspired, as that the Gospels were. Various reasons may be assigned, why many truths should be more obscurely delivered during our Lord's ministry than afterwards, of which he gave several intimations: and where are we to look for the full and explicit declarations of "the whole counsel of God," but in the writings of those whom the Lord Jesus selected as the depositaries of his truths; to whom he gave the keys of the kingdom of heaven; to whom he promised to give the Holy Spirit, "to teach them all things, and lead them into all truth;" and whom he sent, to make known his Gospel, even as the Father had sent him? If the doctrine of the apostles was the unadulterated and entire truth of God, and altogether of divine authority, as they preached it, why should it not be so when they committed it to writing? and if it was not the unadulterated entire truth, but either redundant or defective, then Christianity was corrupted or mutilated, even from the first. It must also be observed, that it is impossible that we can know what the apostles preached, except from what they themselves wrote, or what others wrote concerning them: and can we suppose that their own writings are of less authority than the writings of others on the same subjects? If there be any ground for making this distinction between the Gospels and the apostolical writings, how is the Church "built on the foundation of the apostles and prophets?" 'Hence then it follows, that what the apostles have delivered in these epistles, as necessary to be believed or done by Christians, must be as necessary to be believed and practised in order to salvation, as what was personally taught by Christ himself, and is contained in the Gospels.' (Whitby.)

Most of the epistles, especially those of St. Paul, were written to the Churches, the planting of which is recorded in the Acts of the apostles; and the history so entirely tallies with them, even in the most minute particulars, and evidently without the least design or aim at coincidence, that the more carefully they are examined, and compared with the history, the more will it appear, that both are indisputably genuine. This has been shown clearly, by the learned Dr. Paley, in his Horæ Paulinæ; and I am decidedly of opinion, that all the genius, sagacity, and care of any number of the most able men, who ever lived, would be absolutely insufficient to forge a history, and a number of epistles, so manifestly frank, artless, and often immethodical; and yet to make the one so completely to confirm the other. If ever books had such internal evidence of being genuine, that no reasonable man, after a diligent examination of them, could doubt of it, these are the books. But if the epistles be genuine, they must be inspired, and also prove the divine origin of Christianity. Our Lord not only foretold his own death and resurrection; and that before the destruction of Jerusalem, and in that generation, the Gospel should be very extensively preached; but he promised to invest his apostles and disciples with miraculous powers, and especially with the gift of tongues, in order to accomplish this object. 'Now, I desire to know, whether any 'thing of this nature was ever undertaken, or laid, as the foundation of their credit, by any other authors of any 'doctrine or religion? Whether they ever made their own violent death, and resurrection, the foundation of 'their veracity? Or promised the like powers and assistances, after they were risen, to those who should pro- 'mote, or—embrace their doctrine? Or whether that, which no man else durst undertake, was not performed 'effectually by the Lord Jesus Christ?' (Whitby.)—To the fulfilment of these promises, the apostles, (especially St. Paul,) in these epistles continually refer, as to facts most certainly known by those, to whom they wrote; and which none could deny or question. They appeal to the Churches, whether themselves had not exercised these miraculous gifts among them, nay, conferred them on others: they argue with them, from these gifts, as to the truth of their doctrine, when heretics perverted it: they appeal to these gifts, as deciding between them and their opposers: they lay down rules for the behaviour of the Churches, in respect of them; and they sharply reprove several instances of misconduct in this particular. Can it then be doubted, that, supposing the epistles genuine, these miraculous gifts were publicly exercised and conferred, and that all knew them to be so? And if this was the fact, was not the promise of Christ fulfilled? Is not Christianity from God? And can it be supposed that the writers, who exercised and conferred these powers in so conspicuous a manner, were left to themselves, without the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, in addressing the Churches on the most important subjects, and transmitting their doctrine to posterity?

The epistles in general are written in language, which shows that, if genuine, they must have been known by the Churches, to which they were addressed, during the life of the writers: but can it be supposed that such facts were spoken of as undeniable, during the lives of the writers; and yet, no one of their opposers, either heretics or persecutors, (not to say their friends,) knowing that no such facts had taken place, should stand forth, publicly to deny and confute them? It is also undeniable, that most of the epistles were known, at a very early period, to other Churches, as the writings of the apostles whose names they bear. Very soon, translations were made of them into other languages, copious quotations were taken from them, and homilies, or expositions, were made on them. The Churches, with one consent, acknowledged them as the word of God; and neither heretics, schismatics, nor opposers of the Gospel, denied that they were the genuine writings of the apostles, and the standard records of Christianity. But had these epistles, bearing the name of this or the other apostle, been brought forward after their death, when no one, either in the Church specially addressed, or in other Churches, had ever before heard of them, can it be conceived but that they would have been rejected as spurious? It is evident the claim would have been absurd, and the imposture manifest. Had they not been known during the life of the writers, at what time, or in what manner, could it have been possible to have palmed them on the Church; and to have obtained them the credit of apostolical writings?

The epistle to the Hebrews, not bearing the name of St. Paul; that of James, which it seems at that time, as well as in later ages, was supposed irreconcileable with the doctrine of St. Paul; the second epistle of Peter, which probably was written just before his martyrdom, and was not generally known till after his death; and the second and third epistles of John, in which he only styles himelf "the elder;" were not for some time received by the Churches as genuine; but this shows the scrupulous caution of the primitive Christians in this respect and further inquiry, together with internal evidence, at length obtained the admission of them into the sacred canon. Yet very many writings, which in some places, and for a time, were admitted as apostolical and divine, were afterwards, on fuller investigation rejected, and most of them have sunk into oblivion.

The epistolary part of the New Testament, while it more fully shows the accomplishment of the ancient prophecies concerning the establishment of the Messiah's kingdom, than even the historical part had done, contains also many remarkable prophecies, several of which have already received as remarkable an accomplishment; but some still remain to be fulfilled. (Notes, Rom. xi. 2 Thes. ii. 1—12. 1 Tim. iv. 1—3. 2 Tim. iii. 1—5. 2 Pet. ii. iii.) This also constitutes an irrefragable proof that they were written by inspiration of that God, who sees the end from the beginning.

Finally, it will appear, as we proceed, that the writers of these epistles speak of themselves, and of each other, as authoritatively delivering the truth and will of God to mankind. Even the exceptions, as they are supposed to be in a few instances, more undeniably establish the general rule: for why should an apostle intimate that he only gave his own opinion, and not a divine and authoritative injunction, in a particular case, unless conscious, and unless demanding his readers to allow, that in all other cases he spake as moved by the Holy Ghost? But if they advanced such claims, what alternative is there, between admitting them in their full extent, or decidedly rejecting them? That is, What alternative is there, between receiving the apostolical epistles as the infallible word of God, and the standard of truth and duty, or wholly rejecting them as bold impostures? Had no such claims been advanced, it might have been allowed that they were good men, right upon the whole, yet erroneous in some things: (and then where shall we have a divine standard of Christianity?) But as the case is, either they are infallibly right, their doctrine divine, their writings the standard by which all other doctrines must be tried, or they claim for themselves, and each other, what they had no right to claim. I would be very cautious, in venturing on this ground; but I am fully persuaded, that more injury is done to the cause of truth by a half-hearted allowance, that the epistles, (or other parts of Scripture,) are genuine, authentic, and instructive, but possibly in some things erroneous, than by all the open attacks of infidels. For these plausible statements leave us no standard of truth and duty; no way of discriminating between true doctrine and heresy; no divinely appointed exhibition of the Christian religion, with which all other exhibitions must be compared, and admitted, or rejected, as they agree or do not agree with it.

The peculiar doctrines of the Gospel are here more explicitly stated and explained, and their practical tendency more argumentatively shown, than in the historical books. The distinguishing truths there laid down have been kept in view through the whole of the preceding exposition: and it will, therefore, be unnecessary formally to answer those, who have endeavoured to reconcile this part of the Scripture with systems of a contrary nature and tendency. It may, however, be proper to say, that the author has considered, with some attention, both Dr. Taylor's key to the epistle to the Romans, and the eminent Mr. Locke's comment on several of the epistles: but, deeply convinced that both of these publications "darken counsel by words without knowledge," he can only on some incidental matters deduce instruction from them. In general, if the various terms, used in Scripture concerning Israel as a nation, be in the same, or nearly the same, sense to be applied to Christians under the New Testament, where is the type and the antitype? Where is the true Israel, as distinguished from Israel after the flesh? And where are we to learn either the character, privileges, or duties, of true believers?

Several of the epistles were written on special occasions, but others were not. These special occasions, however, were of that nature, that they gave the most favourable opportunity for explaining doctrines, enforcing precepts, and giving admonitions and counsels of the greatest importance to the Church of Christ in every age. Nor has any thing ever yet been devised, more suited to render "the word of God of no effect," than the notion, that we have little or nothing to do with this and the other part of Scripture, and can conclude nothing general from it, because it was written on a particular occasion. We begin with the epistles of the apostle Paul, who wrote, as well as laboured, more abundantly than all his brethren. Fourteen of his epistles are reserved for our instruction. In all his writings we perceive evident proofs of a sound judgment, a talent for close reasoning, a lively imagination, and fervent affections: sometimes, yet not so often as many have supposed, he induces a measure of obscurity by long parentheses. All his abilities and endowments, however, were directed and superintended by the Spirit of inspiration. The epistle to the Romans is placed first, though some others were written before it: but it was addressed to the Christians who resided in the capital city of that great empire, which then lorded it over the whole known world; and the epistle itself is one of the longest and most comprehensive of all that were written by the apostle. It is not known when, or by whom, the Gospel was first preached at Rome; but it is conjectured that it was carried thither by some of those Jews who were converted at the day of Pentecost, (Acts ii. 10.) Paul, however, had not yet visited that city; but, as the apostle of the Gentiles, he deemed it proper to use this method of establishing the believers in the faith; and of giving them such a comprehensive view of the Christian religion, as might put them upon their guard against false teachers of various descriptions. This epistle is the only part of the scripture, in which divine truth is delivered in a systematical method: and it is a proper model for any one, who intends to compile a body of divinity. After the introduction, the apostle opens his subject, (as it is reasonable to begin such systematical treatises,) by showing man's relations and obligations to God his Creator, and his apostacy from his worship and service: he proceeds to prove the universal sinfulness of both Gentiles and Jews, and the impossibility of any man's justifying himself before God by his own obedience. Having brought the world in guilty, and deserving of wrath, he proceeds to state the method of our salvation by the mercy of God, through the redemption of his Son, and the way of justification by faith in his blood. This he proves, illustrates, and exemplifies very fully: he next proceeds to show that this way of justification is closely connected with sanctification and evangelical obedience: he then states the believer's experience and conflicts; and displays his character, hopes, and privileges: and, at length, he leads our reflections back to the source of these blessings, in the eternal election, and sovereign love and mercy of God. Having thus stated, proved, and answered objections to his doctrine, and discussed several questions respecting the calling of the Gentiles and the rejection of the Jews, he applies the whole discourse by a varity of practical exhortations, precepts, and instructions, enforced by evangelical motives. And having touched upon some particulars suited to the circumstances of those times, he concludes with affectionate salutations, cautions, and prayers, and with ascribing glory to God our Saviour. The order in which the epistles were written, and the date of each, will probably be given at a subsequent period of the work.

CHAPTER I.

The apostle shows his apostolical office, and the great subject of his ministry, 1—5. He salutes the Christians at Rome, 6, 7; thanking God, on their account, and praying for them; especially that he might come and preach among them, 8—15. The Gospel is the power of God to salvation, and shows the only way of justification, 16, 17. Sinners are exposed to the wrath of God, for acting in opposition to the light afforded them, 18—22. A dreadful description of the Gentile world, as given up, by the just displeasure of God, to vile idolatries and iniquities, 23—32.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1—4. According to the custom of those times, the apostle began this epistle by prefixing his name and distinguishing title. The Christians at Rome would receive this letter from Paul, who was also called Saul, and had been a persecutor of the Church, but who now regarded it as his honour and happiness to be the servant of Jesus Christ, and to be called his apostle; having been separated and appointed by the choice and effectual calling of God, to preach his Gospel to the world, and to spend his life in promoting it. This doctrine was no novel invention, but the fulfilment of the promises made in the sacred Scriptures by the prophets; and it respected the Son of God, even Jesus the Saviour, the promised Messiah, the Prophet, Priest, and King of the Church, whom all believers acknowledged and obeyed as their Lord. He was descended from David according to the flesh, or in his human nature: but he had also been declared, and determined, to be the Son of God by that divine power, which raised him from the dead. The expression, "according "to the Spirit of Holiness," has been generally interpreted to signify, "according to his divine nature;" but it is not used in this sense in any other place, nor does it naturally convey that idea. Others therefore explain it of the conception of Jesus, by the Holy Spirit, on which account he was called the Son of God: but this does nothing more than state what he was "according to the "flesh," or in his human nature: whereas the apostle seems to have intended to show his divine nature, as the "only begotten Son of the Father;" and the antithesis, as well as the context, evidently requires this. Our Lord indeed wrought all his miracles by the Spirit of God, which was "given to him without measure:" but the apostle plainly speaks of "the Spirit of holiness," in immediate connexion with the demonstration, that Jesus was the Son of God, which arose from his resurrection from the dead. Now, the pouring out of the Holy Spirit on the witnesses of his resurrection, and all the stupendous effects which followed, both in respect of them, and of those on whom they laid their hands, were a divine attestation to their testimony; and thus Jesus, who was crucified for declaring that he was the Son of God, was "determined "to be the Son of God with power, by his resurrection;" according to the demonstration of that event, arising from the divers powers, signs, and miracles, which the Spirit of God enabled the apostles and primitive Christians to perform. (Note, Heb. ii. 3, 4.) It may also be observed, that the Holy Spirit had foretold by the prophets, that the Messiah would be the Son of God, as well as the Son of David; and also that he would be put to death, and rise again, and enter into his glory. When, therefore, the Lord Jesus, having been put to death as a deceiver and blasphemer, arose from the dead, "ascended on high, "and gave gifts to men," especially by pouring out the Holy Spirit on his apostles and disciples, according to the predictions of holy men, from the beginning, "who spake "as they were moved by the Holy Ghost;" he, in both respects, was "declared to be the Son of God with power, "by his resurrection from the dead, according to the "Spirit of holiness.' (Notes, Acts ii. 22—36. Marg. Ref.)

V. 5—7. From this glorious Saviour, Paul declared

8 First, [d] I thank my God [e] through Jesus Christ for you all, [f] that your faith is spoken of throughout [g] the whole world.

9 For [h] God is my witness, [i] whom I serve * with my spirit in [k] the gospel of his Son, [l] that without ceasing [m] I make mention of you always in my prayers;

10 Making [n] request, if by any means now at length I might have [o] a prosperous journey [p] by the will of God, to come unto you.

11 For [q] I long to see you, [r] that I may impart unto you some spiritual gift, [s] to the end ye may be established;

12 That is, [t] that I may be comforted together † with you, [u] by the mutual faith both of you and me.

13 Now [x] I would not have you ignorant, brethren, [y] that oftentimes I purposed to come unto you, ([z] but was let hitherto,) [a] that I might have some fruit ‡ among you also, [b] even as among other Gentiles.

14 I am [c] debtor both to the [d] Greeks and to the Barbarians, [e] both to the wise and [f] to the unwise.

that he had received mercy and grace, as well as an appointment to the apostolical office; that he might be employed as his instrument, in bringing sinners of all nations to "the obedience of faith," by accepting of the Redeemer's mercy, and becoming subject to his authority, for the honour of his name in their salvation, worship, and service. Among this happy and favoured company, were the persons to whom he sent this epistle; for they too had been called by the Gospel to profess themselves the disciples of Jesus, to bear his name, and to trust and serve him. As Paul was the apostle of the Gentiles, he considered himself peculiarly interested in their welfare, though they had not been converted by his ministry; he had therefore written this epistle to them: and he addressed it, not to the citizens of Rome in general, but to all those, who had been called to be, and were denominated, saints, or holy, separate, and sanctified persons, partakers of divine grace, and devoted to the service of God; and who were thus evidenced to be beloved by him, interested in his mercy and plenteous redemption, renewed in a measure to his holy image in which he delights, and constituted heirs of his everlasting kingdom. These the apostle saluted, by wishing them "grace and peace:" grace to sanctify their souls, and peace to comfort their hearts and consciences. Of these blessings, the sum of all happiness, he ardently desired that every professed Christian at Rome might participate: and that they all might continually have an accession made to that measure which they had already obtained, as springing from the free mercy of God, the reconciled Father of all believers, and coming to them through the Person, merits, and mediation, of the Lord Jesus Christ. This is the customary apostolical salutation; and it is most undeniably a prayer, or act of worship, in which Christ is addressed in union with God the Father. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 8—12. The apostle next assured "the saints at "Rome," that, though personally a stranger to them, he heartily thanked his God and Father, through Jesus Christ, for the mercy which he had shown to them all; as their faith in Christ, and its happy effect upon their conduct, were spoken of in every part of the world. Wherever he went, he heard the commendation of the believers at Rome; and their good conduct was the more noticed, by reason of the renown of that city, and the temptations with which they were surrounded. He could therefore confirm what he was about to say, by solemnly calling to witness that God, whom he worshipped and served, not only with constant and persevering diligence, but with inward fervency, zeal, and devotion, according to the discovery of his glory made in the Gospel, and also by promoting that doctrine, which respects his Son as the great Author and Subject of it. This glorious God was witness that he prayed for them all, on every occasion, without intermission, or neglect; and he especially besought the Lord that he would enable him to go among them, if after so long a time, and many disappointments, he might be favoured with a prosperous journey to come unto them, by the will and appointment of God. For he ardently desired to see and converse with them, that he might impart to them some of those spiritual gifts, (which were generally conferred by imposition of the apostles' hands,) in order to their establishment in the faith. And this he desired, in order that he might share the comfort bestowed on them, and rejoice in ministering to their joy; as well as in conferring with them concerning the nature, object and effects of that faith, which was held both by them and him. St. Paul doubtless meant to remind the Romans of his apostolical character and authority, as sanctioning his doctrine, by which he intended to guard them especially against the judaizing teachers: yet he aimed to do this in as unassuming and affectionate a manner as he could, that he might give no disgust to any person, or furnish false teachers with any handle against him. Some think that the Christians at Rome had received supernatural gifts, but it does not appear that any apostle had been there: Paul, however, expected that these gifts would be more abundantly imparted, when he should go among them, and that they would be thus fortified against such as attempted to pervert them, as well as against the fear of persecution. It has been seen how his prayers for a prosperous journey to Rome were answered, by his being sent thither as a prisoner. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 13—16. The apostle next showed, that he had repeatedly purposed to come to Rome; but that he had been hindered hitherto by his multiplied engagements, and by the opposition made to his endeavours. Indeed, he was exceedingly desirous to have some fruit to his ministry among the Romans, as well as among the other Gentiles: for, as he had been converted in a most extraordinary manner, and intrusted with a dispensation of the Gospel, he thought himself bound to do every thing that he possibly could, to promote the salvation of men in general, especially among the Gentiles. This was a debt, which he owed both to the civilized Greeks, or Romans, and to the rude barbarians; and indeed to the learned and unlearned of every nation, from the wise philosopher to the untutored labourer. With this view of his obligation, he was ready, according to his ability and opportunity, to preach the Gospel at Rome also: though, in that haughty and magnificent capital, he might encounter more contempt and opposition than in other places; and though his address might be less suitable to the fastidious taste of its refined inhabitants. For however the noble, the learned, or the proud, might despise the doctrines of the Gospel, and especially that of salvation by faith in the merits of a Jew, who had been crucified as a deceiver by his own countrymen, yet St. Paul was in no wise ashamed of it, but was ready to glory in his belief of it before all men, as he knew that the power of God attended, and was displayed by that doctrine, for the salvation of every believer from the power of his corrupt passions and habits, from the bondage of Satan, from the love of the world, and the fear of men, and from all sin and misery; so that, whilst Jewish rabbies and pagan philosophers had tried in vain to reform men's lives, the despised Gospel of Christ, wherever it had been preached, had been rendered extensively successful for that purpose. This had first been evidenced among the Jews, in the conversion and holy lives of multitudes, who had before been of very bad characters; and afterwards it had produced similar effects among the Gentiles, vast numbers of whom had been turned from their immoralities and idolatries to the holy worship and service of the true God. "It is the power of God unto salvation." 'To whom? To all that believe. Now it is 'plain, that it is not merely the power of God manifested 'in outward miracles that is there spoken of; for miracles were wrought upon, and in the presence both of 'them that believed not, and them that did believe. The 'power of God there spoken of, is a power felt only by 'them that believe: so that, whatever the enemies of the 'free grace of God may suggest, it cannot be meant of 'those extraordinary manifestations of power in healing 'men's bodies, &c. but of that inward teaching and drawing of the Father, of which the prophets foretold, that 'it would be bestowed in a large manner in Gospel-times.' (Dr. Maclaurin.)

V. 17. (Marg. Ref.) In the Gospel God hath revealed, not only the righteousness of his perfect character and government, and the righteousness required by his holy law, but that also which he has appointed, provided, and introduced, for the justification of sinners before him; and which might be called "the righteousness of God," for other reasons, but especially because it consisted of the perfect obedience unto death of that glorious person, who is "God manifested in the flesh." 'This phrase, 'in St. Paul's style, doth always signify the righteousness 'of faith in Christ Jesus dying, or shedding his blood for 'us. This righteousness consists not in our sanctification, 'but in our justification, or our absolution from our sins 'past, through faith in the blood of Christ, shed for the 'remission of our sins.' (Whitby.) 'Therein is the 'righteousness, which is of the free grace of God, through 'Jesus Christ, revealed to be wholly of faith.' (Locke.) The references, if duly considered, will prepare the reader to expect something still more appropriate in this most remarkable expression, and a far higher privilege to believers, than these concessions, which however are of no small importance, point out to us. This righteousness is revealed "from faith to faith;" it is altogether of faith, from first to last, and without any respect to other distinctions; and the faith which receives it is capable of continual augmentation: or it is revealed, from the faithfulness of God in his word, to the faith of the believer; according to the doctrine of the prophet, that the truly just, or righteous, man should live, or be accepted and saved, by faith, and not by works. V. 18—20. ‘In vain does the evangelical doctrine exhort men to seek righteousness and salvation in Christ alone, apprehended by faith, unless all men be previously convicted as guilty of unrighteousness; which the apostle now begins to prove, concluding at the twentieth verse of the third chapter.’ (Beza.) The apostle here opens his main subject; and begins to show, that all men need the salvation of the Gospel, because none can obtain the favour of God, or escape his wrath by their own works. For, however ignorant persons might imagine that their supposed virtues would atone for their vices, yet, in fact, the wrath of God had been revealed from heaven, against every kind and degree of ungodliness and unrighteousness; in respect “of all who hold the truth in unrighteousness.” This revelation had been especially made by the holy law of God and the Old Testament dispensation, and had now been more generally published and fully explained by the Gospel: (Marg. Ref.) and though some extenuation might be admitted, in respect of those who had not been favoured with “the oracles of God,” yet all men were found guilty, and exposed to this “revealed wrath,” for “holding the truth in unrighteousness,” or acting in opposition to their knowledge, and the conviction of their own consciences. All were acquainted with many leading truths concerning moral duties; but their depravity imprisoned those truths, and so restrained them from duly influencing their conduct. All might have known far more than they did, had they not hated the light through love of sin. Indeed, to this day, no man, of any sect or nation, perfectly lives up to his own principles: all do what they know to be wrong, and omit what they know to be their duty. So that the plea of ignorance cannot be admitted, in its full latitude, in favour of any but idiots; for all rebel against that light, not only which they might have obtained, but which they actually possess. This general principle the apostle proceeded to illustrate by the state of the Gentile world. The Pagans had not the light of revelation: but the works of creation preached to them; and that “which might be known of God,” was made manifest even among them; for God had showed it to them from age to age, ever since the world was created. Even the wonderful formation of their own bodies and souls, as well as the various objects all around them, proclaimed these truths: so that, being endued with rational powers, they could not have failed of knowing him, as their Creator, Benefactor, and Governor, and in respect of many of his attributes, had it not been for the depravity of their hearts. Indeed, God himself dwelleth in light inaccessible, and his essential glory must be invisible to mortal eye: yet “his eternal power and Godhead” are so clearly reflected from, and discernible in, the works which he hath made, that his eternal and underived existence, his omnipotence, and other perfections, must be known from the beauty, excellency, variety, and immensity of his creatures, by all intelligent beings, except as their minds are debased and alienated from him by sin. Thus, even idolaters and Gentiles are left without excuse; and their ungodliness and unrighteousness are evinced to be the effect of their depraved dispositions, rather than of their want of information. They all might have known more of God than they did, had they been properly disposed; and some of them, when they had discovered the vanity of the popular idolatries, and acquired some just notions of God and his worship, continued to act in opposition to their knowledge, from worldly motives. Thus “they imprisoned the truth in unrighteousness:” it is vain to attempt an excuse for them; and the divine verdict brought in against them, accords with the plainest dictates of justice and equity. Revealed. (18.) ‘The words of St. Paul to the Athenians give light to these here to the Romans.’ (Locke.) Note, Acts xvii. 30, 31. Ungodliness denotes the idolatry, irreligion, profaneness, and ingratitude to God, of mankind in general; and unrighteousness, their injustice, oppression, cruelty, and base conduct towards each other; the former may refer to the first table of the law; the latter to the second: yet by both they rebelled against God, and deserved his wrath. Being understood, &c. (20.) Or, “If they are minded they are seen.” ‘The invisible things of God lie within the reach and discovery of men's reason and understanding; but yet they must exercise their faculties and employ their minds about them.’ (Locke.) (Notes, 28—32. Prov. xvii. 16. Marg. Ref.)

V. 21—23. ‘Men of their own accord rushed into idolatry, to understand and condemn which they might have had light enough within, if they had not voluntarily extinguished it, partly by negligence, and partly by wickedness; on which account the apostle says, that “they detained the truth in unrighteousness.”’ (Beza.) Idolatry was first introduced, and became general and perpetual in the world, through man's carnal aversion to the holy character, worship, and service of the true God. The posterity of Noah had some knowledge of Jehovah; but they revolted from his service, and refused to glorify him as God, by their adoration, love, and obedience; neither were they thankful for the bounties of Providence, but abused them by intemperance, and forgot the Giver. Thus impiety and iniquity made way for idolatry, which was become almost universal when God called Abraham. From that time the same causes produced the same effects, in every part of the world. Indeed some of the philosophers of Greece and Rome had acquired a little indistinct knowledge of the being and perfections of the One supreme God; and they speculated on subjects of this kind with some acuteness and plausibility: yet they “glorified him not as God,” either by their avowed adoration, or in the conduct of their lives; nor were they thankful for his goodness to them. On the contrary, they sanctioned, by a hypocritical conformity, the stupid idolatries of their countrymen; and, proud of their superior discernment, they amused themselves with vain fancies and reasonings concerning matters too high and abstruse for them. Thus they were bewildered in speculations, and most of them took refuge in skepticism, or atheism. Their minds, being destitute of practical wisdom and understanding, became more and more darkened with error and delusion; and whilst they professed themselves to be sages, wise men, and philosophers, they were infatuated, or turned into mere fools or idiots, in the great concerns of God and religion. So that most of them relapsed into gross idolatry; and men in general concurred in exchanging the glorious Object of all worship for inanimate idols. They at first commonly changed the glory of the incorruptible God into the image of a mortal man, which they foolishly supposed to be a proper resemblance of him: at length they made images of their deities, like birds, beasts, fishes, serpents, and insects, and thus actually fell down to worship the meanest and most noxious of the creatures. It is well known that many of the ancients, especially the learned Egyptians, worshipped dogs, snakes, reptiles, nay, even vegetables. Thus mankind, having retained from original tradition, or having acquired by the exercise of reason, some general notions of a Deity, invented numerous species of idolatry, and universally forsook the worship of the true God, in all places where revelation was not actually vouchsafed. Indeed, the fact is undeniably the same even to this day; and if any nations seem to be sunk into such total stupidity, as to have no notions of a God remaining among them, this still more clearly proves, not man's want of rational powers, but his carnal enmity to God and religion, through which he becomes more and more the besotted and blinded slave of Satan. (Notes, Is. xliv. 9—20. Marg. Ref) Imaginations. (21.) Or reasonings, (Matt. xv. 19. Luke ix. 46, 47. Gr.) Cicero's books, 'On the nature of the gods,' contain a most striking illustration of the apostle's meaning.

V. 24—27. The race of men, having thus dishonoured God by wilful apostacy and idolatry, he left them, under the influence of Satan, to debase themselves by the most unnatural and abominable uncleanness. This did not so much result from the prevalence of animal inclinations, (for the very brutes are kept from such excessive and unnatural practices,) as from the lusts of their own hearts, which madly sought satisfaction in sensuality, when they had lost the favour of God, and happiness in him. Thus they disgraced their bodies, (which had been most curiously formed by the Creator, to be the instruments of the soul in his worship and service,) by using them to perpetrate with each other the most detestable pollutions. This was permitted judicially; because they had exchanged the truth of God which had been made known to them, respecting his nature, perfections, and worship, for the basest falsehoods and delusions of the devil, and the sophistical conclusions of their own vain reasonings; and in consequence, they had rendered divine honours to creatures, in preference to the infinite Creator, who is in himself "blessed for evermore;" whom all rational creatures ought to adore and bless: and whose praises are celebrated by all the inhabitants of heaven, whilst saints on earth repeat a cordial Amen to them. The idolaters first joined creatures with him in their worship, or adored them as mediators; they used images to represent the invisible Object of their adoration, and at length the vilest of creatures engrossed the whole of it. The Lord therefore being provoked to jealousy by this base apostacy and ingratitude, gave them up to the vilest affections and inclinations, so that they were left to practise such unnatural lusts, as are not fit to be mentioned, except as a stigma on human nature, and to enhance the grace of our redemption. And this was a judgment meet for such a crime; as they had so dishonoured God, through their pride and carnal enmity, it was proper for them to be left to expose their own shame, that the consequences of their apostacy, and the blindness of their boasted reason, as well as the filthiness of their hearts, might be known to the whole intelligent creation. Those unnatural crimes and vile affections, which are most scandalous at present, and carefully concealed and most severely punished, were openly avowed among the Greeks and Romans, even in their politest ages; and their most elegant and celebrated poets have defiled their compositions by the mention of such vile amours, without any expressions of abhorrence, or even of disapprobation! More than, &c. V. 28—32. Men, in all ages and nations, had shown a disposition to discard from their minds the knowledge of the true God. Having no delight in him, they did not endeavour "to retain him in their knowledge." The original word signifies prove, (as metals are assayed,) or approved. The latter seems the meaning in this passage. Not approving the knowledge of JEHOVAH, men every where were prompt to run into idolatry. This was an evident fact all over the Gentile world. The glorious perfections, spiritual worship, and holy service, of God, by no means suited the proud, sensual, carnal, heart of fallen man: so that, as with one consent, they preferred the basest idols to him, because more congenial to their dispositions, and consistent with their favourite pursuits; in righteous judgment he gave them up to a reprobate mind, that they should foolishly and perversely prefer the most shameful and pernicious practices, to those which are decent, honourable, and becoming rational creatures. Thus they were left to commit such crimes, as were utterly inconsistent with reason, nature, and their own and each others welfare. Nay, they proceeded to such lengths in wickedness, that their whole hearts and lives were filled with every kind of fraud, oppression, extortion, and iniquity; they practised all fornication, incest, and adultery without remorse; they delighted in mischief for its own sake: they rapaciously amassed wealth by every means in their power, however vile; they revenged every injury with desperate malice; they envied all, who were more honoured or prospered than themselves; they were prompt to commit murder or engage in any kind of bitter contests, and in every species of deceit and malignity, or habitual mischievousness, as delighting in the misery of others. Secret calumnies and slanders were employed to ruin men's characters; they were haters of God, and of his authority, law, justice, service, and providence, and despiteful to his worshippers and to each other. They were proud of their abilities, possessions, and exploits; they idolized themselves, in boasting of their virtues or performances, and in wholly seeking their own glory in the most ostentatious manner; they invented new species of cruelty, treachery, luxury, impiety, idolatry, sensual gratification, and magnificence. They cast off all regard to parental authority, and despised, injured, or even murdered their aged parents, (as the emperor Nero did his mother Agrippina.) They, acted, in many things, as if they had been destitute of common sense, by the indulgence of their headstrong passions; they violated without scruple the most solemn treaties, covenants, and oaths; they sinned away natural affection, and even exposed their new-born infants without remorse or censure, that they might not have the trouble or expense of bringing them up, and in many places they put to death their parents, when they became helpless and burdensome. They were implacable in their resentments, and unmerciful in their dispositions; so that, besides the cruel carnage of their ambitious wars, the indiscriminate slaughter which often attended the taking of cities, and the frequent murder of their vanquished enemies, their public diversions consisted in beholding gladiators fighting together, till hundreds were sometimes massacred before their eyes, or in seeing slaves and criminals fighting with wild beasts, and often devoured by them. Nor did the principal persons, whether men or women, absent themselves from these horrid spectacles! Nay, even those among them, who were most fully convinced that these things were criminal, and deserving of condemnation and death, according to the judgment of God, not only continued to practise them, but they also delighted in, honoured, caressed, flattered, preferred, or even deified, such persons, as were most notoriously addicted to them. The history of the Greeks and Romans, especially of the latter, about the time when the apostle wrote, abundantly confirms this horrid description of their general character, from which even their philosophers and moralists were by no means excepted.—It might easily be shown, that the morals of idolatrous nations, if judged according to the immutable standard of the divine law, are at this day very little, if at all, better than the description here given of the Gentile world.—Have pleasure, &c. (32.) 'This, say the Greek commentators, is much worse than the bare doing of them; 'for a man may do them by the power of temptation, 'and, by consideration, become sensible of his folly, and 'repent of it; but when he is arrived at that height of 'wickedness, that he not only approves, but delights in 'seeing the like things done by others, he demonstrates 'such a strong affection to them as is incurable.' (Whitby.) —The apostle, however, is showing what need the Gentiles, and all men, had of the grace of the Gospel; and not that they were incurable by it; and in fact multitudes, who once had answered this description, afterwards embraced Christianity, and became "a peculiar people "zealous of good works."

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

A servant of Jesus Christ is the highest style of man; and that of a minister, or an apostle, only specifies the particular service in which he is employed; but the Christian slave is a servant of Christ as truly as the apostle. All those, who are thus distinguished, have been called out of a state of darkness and alienation from God, and separated from their sinful connexions by divine grace; and thus taught to believe, love, adorn, and promote the Gospel of God. This Gospel, though often treated as a new doctrine, hath comprised the whole hope of sinful man from the beginning; and was promised by the prophets long before it was published by the apostles of Jesus Christ. He is the great Subject of the Gospel, being the Son of David, and the Son of God, according to the testimony of the Spirit of holiness by the prophets, and the demonstration of his resurrection from the dead by the power of God, attested by the same Spirit. From his fulness have all his servants received; he gives grace to the sinner, and qualifies the believer or the minister for the work allotted to him; but in vain do any claim authority in the Church, as successors to the apostles, when their lives evince that they have not received regenerating grace, and when, instead of bringing others to the obedience of faith, they themselves are evidently disobedient and unbelieving. The end of the Gospel-ministry is, to bring sinners of all nations to obey the command of God, by believing in his Son, and submitting to his authority, that his name may be glorified in their salvation, and that they may become a peculiar people, to show forth his praise. Happy they, who are thus the called of Jesus Christ to be his saints, beloved of God and devoted to him! They should often recollect their character and privileges, that they may be excited to act consistently; and they should cordially desire an increase of grace and peace to all their brethren in every place. Without grace there can be no substantial peace; in proportion as grace is communicated, peace may be expected; and when grace shall ripen into perfect holiness, peace will become complete fruition. These then are the great blessings, which we should seek for ourselves, our children, our friends, and all around us, in preference to all earthly possessions or prosperity; and they must be sought from the mercy of God our Father, by faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, and by reliance on his merits and mediation.

V. 8—15.

Zealous Christians are always ready to thank God, in behalf of all others who partake of the same invaluable blessings in which they rejoice: and we should cultivate this pious and benevolent disposition, that we may present our grateful tribute to the Lord, not only for our friends, or such as have been converted by our means, but for strangers also, and for all concerning whom we hear a good report. Indeed, if we "serve God with our spirit in "the Gospel of his Son," we shall be sure to approve our hearts before him, as deeply concerned for the peace and prosperity of his Church: and we should also without ceasing, in our daily prayers, make mention of our fellow Christians and the interests of the Gospel, all over the world. Yet, alas, most of us must own with shame, that we are not so earnest, or particular, in this respect, even in our narrow circles, as Paul was, in respect of his most extensive connexions, and with all his vast and multiplied engagements! But we should endeavour to follow him even as he followed Christ: and we ought to long for opportunities of usefulness, as worldly men do for a prosperous trade, or occasions of distinguishing themselves, and acquiring celebrity; and count that the most successful journey or undertaking, in which most good hath been done, though it have exposed us to hardship, loss, or peril. We should earnestly request the Lord, that by his will such opportunities may frequently return; though we know not in what manner these prayers may be answered: we should readily impart to others, what God hath intrusted to us, whether to supply their temporal wants, or to promote their spiritual comfort and establishment; we ought to rejoice in making others joyful; and should peculiarly take pleasure in communing with those who believe, hope for, and experience, the same things with us. But purposes, resulting even from this happy and excellent state of mind, may often be retarded and disappointed; nor ought we to be discouraged or desist on this account. We should still desire and expect the opportunity of bringing forth fruit, though we have been hindered hitherto: and while we ought to be thankful for the least usefulness, we should not say of any measure, let this suffice us as long as we have health and strength for labour, and so much yet remains to be done, before all nations are brought to the obedience of faith. Being redeemed by the blood, and converted by the grace of the Lord Jesus, we are altogether his: and for his sake, we are debtors to all men, to do them all the good we can, to whatever nation they belong, or of whatever complexion, rank, capacity, or education, they are. Nor ought we to deem such services any great thing; but merely our bounden duty, our debt of gratitude to Christ, and of love to our neighbours and brethren.

V. 16—22.

We ought not for a moment to allow of that absurd and hateful shame, which the enmity and contempt of the wicked against the Gospel often excite in our minds. On the other hand, we should glory in the doctrine of the cross, and be ready to profess or preach it in any place, or before any description of men, according to our ability, and our call in Providence; as knowing that it is "the "power of God unto salvation to every one that be-"lieveth," and that no sinner can be saved in any other way. It is indeed evident to this day, that learned speculations, and supposed rational schemes, or the elegances of admired orators, are not attended in general with that power, which converts sinners from impiety and immorality to the love and service of God: but this effect is produced, in some good measure, wherever the despised Gospel is preached, even though it be in a homely manner, and by persons of inferior abilities and erudition. For by the Gospel is the righteousness of God revealed; his way of justification and sanctification is opened; and sinners are taught to trust in him, and to come before him, by faith in his mercy through the righteousness, atonement, expostulates with the Jews, who trusted in the law, and yet brake it; and shows that external forms will not profit, without internal piety, which God would accept even in the uncircumcised, 17—29.

and intercession of his beloved Son. And he will honour this doctrine, because it honours his perfections, law, and government, and because it is his own appointment: but they, who devise other schemes, may put forth their own power to make them successful, if they can; for God will not own or countenance them. The Gospel is worthy of universal acceptation, "for the wrath of God is revealed "from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness "of men;" and all have been, in some degree, ungodly and unrighteous. No man can plead, that he has fulfilled all his obligations to God and to his neighbour; nor can any one truly say, that he hath not "held the "truth in unrighteousness," or that he hath acted up to the light afforded him. Whatever may be pretended, atheism, infidelity, impiety, and idolatry spring from human depravity, not from unavoidable ignorance or mistake. The heathen nations might have known enough of God from his works, and the benefits conferred on them, to have excited their admiring love and gratitude, and to have influenced them to adore and obey their Creator and Benefactor; had they not shut out the light, or sinned in opposition to it: so that even they were without excuse in their apostacy and idolatry, however succeeding rebels against God may have vindicated and justified them. But instead of glorifying him in humble gratitude, according to their measure of information; their pride and carnal enmity led them to indulge vain conjectures and reasonings; till their professed and boasted wisdom ended in the most palpable and degrading folly and stupidity. Thus idolatry, the stigma of man's understanding, was introduced and propagated, through the wickedness of his heart; and rational creatures exchanged the worship of the glorious Creator for that of brutes, reptiles, or inanimate images: and they continued to wander from God, till all traces of true religion must have been lost, had not the revelation of the Gospel prevented it.

V. 23—32.

Whatever speculators may assume of the sufficiency of man's reason to discover divine truth and moral obligation, or to regulate men's practice; stubborn facts confute the flattering hypothesis: and as far as God hath in awful displeasure left men to themselves, they have dishonoured him by the most absurd idolatries and superstitions, and degraded themselves by "vile affections," and abominable lusts: nor is it generally expedient to mention the enormities, to which they, who, liking not to retain God in their knowledge, preferred their own inventions to his holy worship, have been given up: when being left to a reprobate mind, their deluded judgments, their perverse wills, and their depraved affections, have reciprocally helped to corrupt, and have been corrupted by, each other. A most horrid view of the moral character of the Greeks and Romans, even amidst all their prosperity, politeness, and erudition, is here set before us by the apostle: and the student, who judges of characters and actions by the law of God, will perceive, that their own historians, orators, and poets, amidst all their flattering and false colouring, adduce such facts, and make such representations, as fully prove the apostle's picture to be a real and striking likeness, and no caricature. Nay, the most illustrious and celebrated persons among them, may be produced, as most exactly answering to this horrid description! It must indeed be thankfully acknowledged, that Christianity has had considerable effect on mankind in general, in giving them more just notions of excellence, and in humanizing their manners, especially in respect of war: so that battles are sometimes now scarcely more fierce and bloody than the diversions of the savage Romans were. Our laws and customs also restrain, and drive into dark recesses, those abominations, which stalked abroad with horrid effrontery among the Pagans. There are also great numbers of real Christians among us. Yet after all, what multitudes, even in this land, seem to be the original of the picture before us! They are full of all unrighteousness, and commit all uncleanness with greediness; or they gratify their enormous avarice by oppressions, extortion, and cruelty; or they are full of envy, deceit, contention, ambition, ostentation, malice, or malignity. Some rush upon murder from a diabolical pride and revenge, which they call honour; others vent their malice by whispering calumnies and slanders, to ruin their neighbour's reputation. Multitudes are so ingenious in contriving new species of fraud, perjury, impiety, or dishonesty; that legislators can scarcely keep pace with them, in devising new statutes to counteract their villany. While disobedience to parents is, alas! shamefully common: children are often as shamefully turned over to hirelings, and neglected by their parents, as if they were "without natural affection;" and it is too obvious, that numbers are implacable and unmerciful to those, whom they can exult over or oppress with impunity. Thus men show themselves to be haters of God and his holy service: not only by doing such things as he hath forbidden, and adjudged deserving of his wrath; but by applauding, and taking pleasure in the company of those who blaspheme his name and trample on his authority, as though they were the most worthy, generous, and excellent of the human race: while the pious servants of God are proportionably despised and shunned. These are they who would discard revelation, and who count the preaching of the cross foolishness! But their conduct demonstrates their need of it, and that it is a remedy which they must avail themselves of, or perish. Finally, we may here observe, that religion moderates and regulates natural affections; but excess of depravity extinguishes them: that it is a proof of more determined impiety, for men to take pleasure in the company of the enemies of God; than to commit many crimes, whilst the heart and conscience rise up against them: and that it is a peculiar cause for gratitude, if we have been restrained from these enormities, to which by nature we are as propense as any others of our apostate race.

THEREFORE [a] thou art inexcusable, [b] O man, [c] whosoever thou art, that judgest: for wherein thou judgest another, thou condemnest thyself; [d] for thou that judgest doest the same things.

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1—3. The apostle is commonly supposed to have here passed from the state of the Gentiles, to animadvert on that of the Jews; though some think that the heathen philosophers and moralists were also included. He, however, seems to have expressed himself in this general manner, that he might include all those, of every nation, sentiment, or description, "who hold the "truth in unrighteousness," or object to "the righteous-"ness of God by faith," (Note, 1. 17, 18;) and who are ready to judge and condemn others, though guilty themselves. Of these, the Jews were the most notorious; for they disdained and abhorred the Gentiles as profane, abominable, and utterly undeserving of God's favour; whilst they thought themselves a holy people, and entitled to all their privileges by an unalienable right. Yet, while they would join with the apostle in showing the inexcusable wickedness of the Gentiles, they were equally or more inexcusable; for they proudly arrogated, and severely exercised, the office of a judge, and yet the sentence, which they denounced on others actually condemned themselves; as they might be proved guilty of the very same crimes, or such as were of similar malignity. They copied the vices of the very heathen whom they condemned; like them they acted in opposition to the light afforded them, and they were unthankful, rebellious, and unrighteous, even as the Gentiles were. But they, and all other persons in the world, whosoever they were, who acted in this manner, must be reminded, that assuredly the judgment of God, according to the truth of his word, and the real character and conduct of men, would be then executed on them: and, instead of meeting with favour on account of their external advantages, or their condemnation of sin in others, their punishment would be enhanced by these very circumstances. For could any man suppose, that when he had committed the same crimes, which he judged deserving of punishment in others, he should himself escape the judgment of God? This intimated to the unbelieving Jews, that personal and national judgments awaited them, unless they fled for refuge to the grace of the Gospel. 'These Gentiles were by the Jews reputed as 'unclean, great sinners, and so incapable of salvation. 'To these Jews the apostle in this chapter directs his 'discourse, proving here, that they who lived under the 'law wanted this justification as much as others, being 'also great sinners; and in the following chapters, that 'neither they nor the Gentiles could obtain this justification 'by the law.' (Whitby.)—The outward wickedness of the Jews was enormous at this time, as Josephus has shown: in this sense they copied the worst crimes, (idolatry excepted,) of the despised Gentiles; and their superior advantages rendered their conduct still more atrocious. (Note, Matt. vii. 1—5.)

V. 4—6. The Gentiles were without excuse, because they were unthankful to their Creator and Benefactor. Did then the Jews despise the exuberant riches of his kindness to them, whom he had so peculiarly favoured? (Marg. Ref.) He had distinguished them, both by temporal and spiritual benefits, in every age: though they had always proved rebellious, yet he had still exercised immense goodness, forbearance, and long-suffering, towards them; and he had at length sent his Son among them. Even after they had crucified him, he had in infinite mercy ordered the first proposals of his Gospel to be made to them; and he still besought them by his apostles and ministers to accept of this salvation! And did they despise all this as a small favour? Did it embolden them to continue in sin? Or did the Lord's special mercy and patience towards them lead them to conclude that he would always favour them, however ungratefully they rebelled against him? If they thus despised his rich goodness, they strangely mistook its tendency, as it ought to lead and induce them to repentance. The more kindness God exercises, the greater aggravation is there in the sinner's disobedience, and the more should he be humbled for his base ingratitude. The patience of God gives the sinner time and opportunity for repentance, and the discoveries of his mercy furnish him with motives and encouragements; and were it not for man's total depravity, the proposals of the Gospel must prevail with every one to repent of his departure from God, and to return to his worship and service. (Notes, Luke xv. 11—24.) If the Jews presumed upon the special kindness of God to them, and continued to reject the Gospel, and to disobey his commandments, according to the obduracy of their impenitent hearts, their condemnation would be proportionably severe; and the longer God had patience with them, the heavier vengeance would be executed on them. And all others, who thus employed the day of mercy in committing sin, hardening their hearts in impenitence because of the goodness of God, would find that they had accumulated wrath as their treasure, for themselves, which would be secured for them, till the day of wrath and final recompense. Then the Lord will manifest the perfect justice of his decisions before the whole world, to the full satisfaction of all his friends, and the confusion of his enemies: seeing he will then render to every individual according to his works; whether he was an obstinate unbeliever, or a humble penitent believer in the divine Redeemer. (Notes, Matt. xvi. 27. xxv. 31—46.)

V. 7—11. The apostle here gradually proceeds to a more explicit mention of the Jews, whom he especially intended to "conclude under sin." According to the whole tenour of Scripture, as well as the dictates of common sense, no sinner can do well, till he repents, submits to God, and seeks mercy from him. The Jew, who did this, must have respect to the types and promises of a Saviour, with which the law of Moses was replete, as well as to the preceptive part of it; and he alone, who did this, would perform any spiritual obedience. If then there was a man, any where, who embraced by faith the revelation of glory, honour, and immortality, through the promised Messiah, made in the word of God, and was earnestly bent upon obtaining this blessing; if he sought the inheritance, by repenting, "ceasing to do evil, learning to do well," attending on the ordinances of God, obeying his commandments, and thus waiting patiently for the completion of his promises; and if he proved his sincerity, by patience under trials, and perseverance in well doing amidst temptations and difficulties; this man would surely be made partaker of eternal life, according to the constitution of the most gracious covenant of God in Jesus Christ, whatever measure of explicit knowledge he might be favoured with, or under whatever dispensation he might live. But as all trangressors of the law are under condemnation, so those Jews, or others, who disputed against the Lord's method of saving sinners, and his sovereignty in dispensing unmerited favours, whose "eye was evil, "because the Lord was good, who were angry at the kindness shown to returning prodigals, and who refused to obey the truth, by embracing the Gospel, and submitting to the promised Saviour, choosing rather to obey unrighteousness, and continue the slaves of sin and Satan, all such persons would surely sink under the indignation and wrath of their offended Judge. For tribulation and anguish of spirit will be the inevitable portion of every soul of man, who "worketh evil;" and the Jew will have the first and most severe lot in this condemnation, though the unbelieving and disobedient Gentile will not be exempted. On the other hand, that glory, honour, and peace, which God confers on the objects of his special love, will certainly be given to "every man that worketh good," as a sinner who obeyeth the truth. The Jew indeed had the first proposal of this mercy, but no Gentile was excluded from the full participation of it, "for God is no respecter of "persons." (Notes, Acts x. 1—8. 34, 35.) It is evident, that the apostle did not mean that either Jew or Gentile could be saved by his own works, without faith in Christ, but that, "by obeying the truth," and by that patient continuance in well-doing which springs from faith, the Gentile would obtain eternal life; and without this, the Jew must fall under wrath and condemnation. To suppose he meant that any man could be saved without believing the Gospel, would absurdly make him advance principles subversive of his own grand argument throughout the whole epistle, and of his doctrine in all his epistles. He had many reasons for first proposing his doctrine in this covert and practical manner. He thus avoided giving immediate disgust to the Jewish reader, previous to the more explicit declaration of the Gospel, for which he was here only making way; he intimated, that they, who really best understood and obeyed the law, would most readily embrace the Gospel, and that the Jews did not refuse to "obey the truth," from love to the holiness of the law, but from "obedience to unrighteous"ness." V. 12--16. No Gentiles could be found, who had perfectly acted according to the light of their own dispensation; so that none could be justified by their own obedience; yet, as they had sinned without law, or without the advantages of a written authenticated rule for their conduct, they would "perish without law;" and be consigned to a milder punishment than the wicked Jews would be: who having sinned in or under, the law, would be judged by it, and fall under the awful curses denounced in it against the disobedient. The Jews indeed were apt to imagine that the reading and hearing of the law, together with some attention to the legal ceremonies, would justify them before God, and atone for all their violations of the moral precepts; just as many professed Christians expect to be justified by some general attendance on outward ordinances, and a decency of moral conduct, though they are habitually guilty of many known sins. But the apostle declared, that the mere hearers of the law could not be justified by it: if they would seek acceptance in this way, they must be doers of the law; and if any thus perfectly performed its righteous demands, he might then indeed claim the reward of righteousness, but not otherwise. (Note, Luke x. 25—29.) For even the Gentiles, who had not the written law, when from natural principles they performed any of those duties which the law required, were in this respect a law to themselves; and by obeying thus far their own rule came nearer to righteousness, than the Jews who broke their rule. The fragments of the law, which had originally been written in the heart, exerting their influence by a natural sense of right and wrong, appeared in their works. Their consciences also testified to the propriety of this part of their conduct, and produced an inward satisfaction: whilst, at the same time, their secret thoughts, or their reasonings one with another, served to accuse or excuse themselves, or each other, according to the conformity of their conduct to their own sentiments of right and wrong, or the contrary. If then the very Gentiles could not but condemn themselves, when they acted against their own consciences; how absurd and presumptuous must it be for a Jew to expect justification before God, by a law which he was continually transgressing! This seems to be the apostle's argument; but it by no means implied that the Gentiles performed any spiritual obedience; or that any of them could be justified on account of their partial and scanty compliance with the dictates of their own understanding. As rational creatures in a fallen state, yet not desperate, they sometimes acted more morally than at other times; and accordingly their consciences approved, or disapproved, of their conduct: and the same is the case at this day with infidels and mere nominal Christians. This is an earnest and evidence of a future judgment, when God will judge the secret actions, thoughts, motives and affections of all men, by his Son Jesus Christ; which was one principal doctrine of the Gospel that Paul preached both to Jews and Gentiles. As the apostle plainly says, that "as many as have sinned "without law shall perish without law," it is rather surprising that any expositors should have thought the case of Job and his friends, and Cornelius, to be referred to. Probably, Job lived and died before the law; and he had traditional revelation, as the patriarchs had; and Cornelius, though not observant of the ceremonial law, had the Scriptures of the Old Testament, and by the grace of God had studied them to good purpose. The apostle's object evidently was, to convince his readers that neither revelation, nor the light of reason and conscience, could save those who failed of obeying them; that all had in many things failed, however in particular instances some had been obedient; and that all must perish, though with different degrees of aggravation, unless saved by the Gospel. 'Hell 'hath no power over sinners of Israel, because Abraham 'and Isaac descended thither to fetch them thence. No 'circumcised person goes to hell, God having promised to 'deliver them from it, for the merit of circumcision.— 'All Israelites have their portion in the world to come; 'and that notwithstanding their sins; yea, though they 'were condemned here for their wickedness.' (Extracts from Jewish writers in Whitby.) It would not be easy to produce any passage from modern writers, in which proud self-righteousness and rank antinomianism are so completely combined; but a considerable portion of the same leaven may often be discerned both among papists and protestants.

24 For [p] the name of God is blasphemed among the Gentiles through you, [q] as it is written.

V. 17—24. In order to understand this chapter, it should be remembered, that the apostle is combating the prejudices and presumption of the Jews; to whom he expected the epistle would be shown, and whose influence he knew would be employed to unsettle the minds of the believers at Rome. The Gentiles are therefore only introduced by way of illustrating the argument, and not in order to show in what way they should be justified. The apostle here immediately addressed himself to any Jew, that was willing to take up the argument. He supposed him to rest his hope of acceptance on the law, and to boast of God, as standing in a covenant-relation to him. He thought himself well acquainted with the will of God; and, as an expert casuist, he could "distinguish things "which differed," and give the preference to such as were more excellent, having from his youth been instructed, or catechised, from the law. In this confidence he thought himself qualified to guide and enlighten the blind and benighted pagans, and to instruct such as became proselytes, whom he deemed foolish, and mere babes, compared with himself, as he had got a complete knowledge of the whole law, having an epitome, or abstract, of it in his memory; yet this was but a mere form, semblance, and outside appearance of the spiritual knowledge and true meaning of the law, which, rightly understood, would lead him to trust in the promised and typified Redeemer, and not in the law itself. In this form he rested, without even obeying the precepts of the law according to his own exposition; as if his work had been to instruct others, and not himself! Or as if he meant to insult the great Lawgiver, by studying his commandments in order to break them! Did such a man explain and enforce the law against theft, and then practice dishonesty? Did he commit adultery, after quoting and explaining the seventh commandment? Did he sacrilegiously embezzle the sacred treasures, or defraud the Lord of his dues, through an idolatrous love of money, after having expressed his abhorrence of idolatry? It was notorious, that many of the chief priests, scribes, and elders, who appeared most zealous for the law, were guilty of these and similar crimes: and the rest, who rejected the Gospel and made their boast in the law, would be found to dishonour God, by evidently breaking it. For in fact the name of God was blasphemed among the Gentiles, and they were set against true religion by the wickedness of the Jews, as it was written in their Scriptures, and was a charge brought frequently by the prophets against their fathers. (Marg. Ref.) The terms here used concerning the Gentiles aptly expose the arrogant self-wisdom of the Jews. 'This 'passage may be illustrated from the Jewish writings; for 'they say that he, who teacheth others what he doeth 'not himself, is like a blind man who hath a candle in 'his hand to give light to others, whilst he himself doth 'walk in darkness.' Blasphemed, &c. (24.) 'Of this 'Josephus doth frequently accuse them, saying, 'What 'wickedness do you conceal or hide, which is not known 'to your enemies? You triumph in your wickedness, 'strive daily who shall be most vile, making a show of 'your wickedness, as if it were virtue.' 'And thinkest 'thou this, O man, that thou shalt escape the judgment 'of God, who punisheth the Gentiles, when thou art as 'guilty as they of acting against thy own conscience, 'and doing that for which thy own mouth condemns thee; 'and which doth also cause them to "blaspheme that "holy name by which thou art called?" (Whitby.)

V. 25—29. Though chargeable with the grossest violations of the moral law, the Jews confided in circumcision, as if it had secured their covenant-relation to God. But the apostle showed them, that, though circumcision, and the means of grace connected with it, would be very advantageous to the conscientious Jew, who copied the example of Abraham; especially in bringing him acquainted with the oracles of God, and preparing him to receive the Gospel; yet they could not profit the presumptuous transgressor, who rested in them, and neglected that "righteousness by faith," of which it was the seal. If a man cleaved to the law, he must perfectly obey it, in order to justification; circumcision made "him a debtor to ful"fil the whole law;" and his transgressions cast him out of the covenant of God, as if he had never been circumcised. On the other hand, if an uncircumcised Gentile should regulate his conduct according to the righteousness prescribed by the law, ought he not to be deemed one of God's true worshippers, notwithstanding his uncircumcision? Such Gentiles, as were taught by divine grace thus to love and serve God, would, like Cornelius, embrace the Gospel when proposed to them: and thus in uncircumcision, the external natural state of man, they, being made partakers of an inward spiritual change, would judge and condemn the Jew, who, having the letter of the law and the outward circumcision, had no inward disposition to obedience. For, in fact, he was not to be counted a Jew, or one of God's chosen people, who was only so in his outward profession or descent; nor was that the true circumcision, the true seal of the covenant, which was outward in the flesh. But he was the real Jew, or child of Abraham, who had the inward disposition of his believing and obedient progenitor; and that was the true circumcision, which was wrought in the heart by regeneration, according to the spiritual meaning, and not the mere letter, of the law; producing an inward conformity of the judgment and affections to its holy precepts. This indeed men could not see, or would not approve and commend, but rather despise and hate; but God would approve, commend, and value it. So that, though the outward seal was, for the time, necessary; yet the inward grace, or the thing signified, was always far more excellent; and the former was now superseded by the Christian dispensation, and could be of no use to those who tenaciously adhered to it.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

The censures which men pass on others, who perhaps justly deserve them, may yet render themselves more inexcusable, while they do the same things. The branches of man's disobedience are numerous, yet they all spring from the same root; nor can any one judge another to be deserving of divine wrath, without, at the same time, condemning himself; for though he may not have committed the same crimes, yet he hath been guilty of the same apostacy from God, and rebellion against him, and is equally chargeable with sinning against his better judgment in various ways. Frequently, superior advantages render a man's apparently lighter offences more aggravated in the sight of God, than the more scandalous sins of his worse educated neighbour, against which he vehemently declaims. We are indeed very incompetent judges of the comparative heinousness of men's conduct; but it is certain that the judgment of God is, and will be, "according to truth," against all who break his law and reject his grace. To him we ought to leave others, and to be chiefly concerned to judge ourselves, and to seek mercy according to his blessed Gospel. If our fellow-sinners cannot stand before us in judgment, how shall we, who are guilty of the same things, escape the righteous condemnation of a heart-searching God? In deciding against them, we pass sentence upon ourselves; and "if our heart condemn us, God is greater than our heart, and knoweth all things." The excuses which numbers make for their misconduct may very commonly be turned against them; nor would men in general be so daringly wicked, were it not for their experience of God's long-suffering, and their general notions of his mercy. But they, who thus "despise the riches of his goodness and forbearance," and grow more bold in rebellion by that kindness, which should "lead them to repentance," will find at last that they have "been sinning against their own souls;" and that their hard and impenitent hearts have led them "to treasure up wrath, against the day of wrath, and revelation of the righteous judgment of God." Indeed, this is the daily employment of every unbeliever; and he adds to his store with a rapidity of increase, proportioned to his crimes and abused advantages. He himself will certainly reap the harvest that he now sows, and the longer he is spared in the long-suffering of God, the more terrible will be the day of righteous retribution, in case he proceed in this destructive course.

V. 7—16.

The questions concerning justification, election, or efficacious grace, should be kept distinct from those that relate to the character and conduct of the righteous and the wicked. If a man cannot be satisfied with an earthly portion, but aspires after glory, honour, and immortality, and if he seeks this inheritance by faith in the promises of God, and patient continuance in well doing, he doubtless is in the way to eternal life. But if men quarrel with the precepts and sanction of God's holy law, with his decrees and dispensations, and with his truths and ordinances, or with any thing rather than their sins, if they "do not obey the truth, but obey unrighteousness," and live in allowed violations of the divine law, no doubt they are in the broad road to destruction, and if they proceed in that path, indignation and wrath will overtake them, to whatever Church or sect they may belong. Indeed, tribulation and anguish must come upon all impenitent evil-doers; but glory, honour, and peace, will be awarded to all, "who are taught by the grace of God to live soberly, righteously, and godly, in the present world," "for there is no respect of persons with God." Whatever may now be objected to this, from some doctrines ill understood, or from appearances in providence which are misconstrued, it will be made manifest to all the world, in the day when "God shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ," as he hath assured us he will, in his holy Gospel. Then they who, not having the written word, have sinned against the dictates of their own consciences, will be proved guilty, and condemned by that rule. will be judged and punished according to that law: and the professors of the Gospel will be shown to have been either true believers or hypocrites, according to the effects produced by the truth on their tempers and conduct. For if the very Gentiles were a law unto themselves and each other, when they acted contrary to "the work of the "law, written in their hearts," how absurd must it be for any man to expect acceptance with God by a written law which he hears and disobeys; or by the Gospel, when he does not practically believe it! No man can indeed be justified by his own obedience, because all men deviate from their rule: yet the nearer they act in conformity to their principles and convictions, the lighter will be their condemnation; and the greater the distance there is between their known rule and their allowed practice, the more aggravated must be their guilt, when the secrets of men shall be brought to light, and all these infinitely important concerns shall be determined by the omniscient and righteous Judge.

V. 17—29.

The Jew, who rested in the law, and made his boast of God, and was proud of his superior knowledge and attainments, will, at the last day, be more deeply condemned, than the blind Gentile whom he so greatly disdained; and numbers, who call themselves Christians, and have learned many right notions of the Gospel as a system, and so deem themselves the children of God, though they obey not the truth, will perish more dreadfully than their more ignorant neighbours, who have sinned against less light and inferior advantages. Indeed, the sermons which many preach, and the books which they publish, will testify against them; and it behooves ministers, especially, to be very jealous over themselves in this respect; for it is far more congenial to the self-flattery of our hearts to instruct others, than to bear the yoke ourselves. Many teach their hearers the truth and will of God, who never teach themselves: they lay down good rules, but never practise them; and the discoveries of the great day will show, that some, who appeared to be the guides of the blind, and the light of such as sat in darkness, were indeed dishonest men, adulterers, or sacrilegious mercenaries. Numbers despise their ignorant neighbours for resting in a dead form of godliness, and yet they themselves trust in a form of knowledge which is equally lifeless and inefficacious; and many glory in the Gospel, whose unholy lives dishonour God, and cause his name and truth to be blasphemed among his enemies. In short, no forms, ordinances, or notions, can profit us, without regenerating grace, which will always eventually lead us to seek an interest in "the righteousness of God by faith." The distinction between truth and error, and between divine ordinances and human inventions, is indeed immutable and most important; yet a man may be alive to God, who maintains some errors, cleaves to some superstitions, and forms improper conclusions in respect to some divine institutions: while another, who is very clear in his notions, and exact in externals, may be dead in sin, uncircumcised in heart; and, through the letter and the outward form, he may deceive himself, and be a scandal to the Gospel. For he is no more a Christian now, than he was a Jew of old, who is one outwardly; "neither is that bap-"tism, which is outward in the flesh:" but he is the real Christian, who is inwardly a true believer, with an obedient faith; and the true baptism is that of the heart, by "the washing of regeneration and the renewal of the Holy "Ghost," producing a spiritual mind, and a cordial subjection to the truth, in its holy import and tendency. A Christian of this character will seldom be much approved by zealots of any party, any more than by the world at large; but he will be accepted of God, and at length welcomed with "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter "thou into the joy of thy Lord."

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1, 2. If disobedient Jews could not be accepted, and if pious Gentiles might be saved, it might be inquired what advantage the Jew had above the Gentile, or what good circumcision did him? The whole Old Testament implied, that God had peculiarly favoured the posterity of Abraham; and the law, together with the seal of circumcision, had been supposed to convey some special privileges: and did the apostle mean to level all these distinctions, and to prove that the Jews had no advantage from their relation to Abraham and their national covenant? To this he replied, that they had doubtless much benefit from them in every way. The law and circumcision could not indeed save them in their sins, or by their own efficacy; yet they gave them great advantages for obtaining salvation. The stated ministry of the priests, the occasional messages of the prophets, the ordinances, of the temple, the worship at their synagogues, their education in an acquaintance with the true God, and at a distance from idolatry, the many good examples that were set before them, and the dispensations of providence respecting them, were means of grace, which probably were made effectual to the conversion of more persons in that one nation, than were converted in all the rest of the world. But especially the oracles of God, the sacred writings of Moses and the prophets, were committed to them; and the written word of God had been continued among them through their several generations, to direct them how to seek acceptance with God, and to walk before him. In them the Messiah was promised, and the various particulars of his character, miracles, redemption, and kingdom, were typified and predicted: among the Jews he made his appearance in the appointed time; in him the Scriptures were fulfilled before their eyes, and numbers of them had believed in and found salvation by him. Oracles, &c. But because 'they did not this work sufficiently, it is Christ's ap'pointment to the apostles, that they should disperse 'themselves unto all nations, and so bring them to the 'knowledge of his will.' (Hammond.) It behooves Christians in every age to remember, that the Scriptures are thus intrusted to them also, in order that they may communicate the blessing to all around them, and to all who shall come after them, by every proper means, to the utmost of their ability. (Note, ix. 4, 5.)

V. 3, 4. What if some, if the greater part of the nation, from carnal and ambitious motives, had obstinately, and wickedly rejected this divine Saviour? Did their unbelief render the faithfulness of God ineffectual? He had fulfilled his promises to their fathers; and if they would not receive and submit to the Seed of Abraham and of David, could they pretend that God had failed of his word, because he would not continue his special favour to them, notwithstanding their disobedience and atrocious wickedness? God forbid that such a thought should be allowed in any one's mind! "Let it not be," (for that is the literal translation of the words;) let every man rather humbly acknowledge the veracity and faithfulness of God, though it should require him to suppose that all men were liars, hypocrites, or deceivers, as every one in some degree must be allowed to be. (Ps. lxii. 9.) Let the blame of the rejection of the Messiah rest on them and their hypocrisy, and not be supposed to reflect upon the faithfulness of God: even as David, when he had committed grievous offences, acknowledged that God was by his crimes justified in his declarations concerning the desperate wickedness of the human heart; and that this humiliating event was permitted, to display more clearly his truth, justice, and mercy; and that God might be fully vindicated from all those presumptuous charges, by which men venture to arraign the testimonies of his word, the threatenings of his law, or the dispensations of his providence. (Note, Ps. li. 4.)

V. 5—8. To the foregoing conclusion of the apostle the cavilling Jews might reply, that if their unrighteousness gave occasion to the more illustrious manifestation of the divine justice, or rather of showing more evidently the necessity and excellency of "the righteousness of God" for man's justification, would he not be unrighteous, if he took vengeance on them, for those actions which eventually displayed his glory? This objection the apostle adduced as a man, an unbeliever, a carnal unregenerate man, who purposed to justify himself, and find fault with the sentence of God against him. In fact, the wickedness and obstinate unbelief of the Jews fully proved the need which all men have of "the righteousness of God by "faith," and also his justice, in punishing them for their sins, and in the sentence of the law against all transgressors; and thus in every sense it "commended his "righteousness." Yet the thought, that it would be unjust in him to take vengeance on them, ought to be rejected with abhorrence: for if he could not justly punish those crimes, which made way for the display of his glory, how could he judge the world? In that case he never could inflict vengeance on any criminal; for he will take occasion from the rebellion of all fallen creatures to display his own glorious perfections to the greater advantage: though the intention of transgressors, and the natural tendency of their conduct, are diametrically contrary to both. So that this proves still more fully the malignity of sin as committed against a Being of such infinite wisdom, power and perfection, that he educes good to his creation, and glory to himself, from those very actions, that naturally tend to the destruction of his creatures, and the dishonour of his name. This objection might for substance be stated in another way: suppose the truth of God, in his predictions, promises, or denunciations, should be more abundantly manifested to his glory by any man's telling a wilful lie; why should the liar be punished for giving occasion to the display of God's glory? Yet every one must see, that the lie thus told was directly contrary to the truth of God, and merely the occasion of displaying it; and the event could not deduct from the malignity of the lie. If it were in any case admitted, that a violation of the law of God ceased to be criminal, because his glory was eventually promoted by it, then the slanderous report spread concerning the Christians by those, who, mistaking the doctrine of free grace, affirmed that they said, "Let "us do evil, that good might come," would indeed be established as a general principle, and as the rule of man's conduct, instead of the law of God. But in fact, the condemnation of such, as thus abused the Gospel, or who committed sin that good might come from it, was most righteous. The blame of their sins belonged only to themselves, the honour of the good educed from them to God alone. Different opinions indeed are advanced concerning the persons, of whom the apostle said, "whose "damnation is just." Some interpret it of the Jews, and others who reject the Gospel: but this proposition, though true, seems not to arise out of the context, or belong to the argument. Others apply the awful sentence to the calumniators, who charged the Christians with saying, "Let us do evil, that good may come:" but the clause, "as we be slanderously reported," &c. is I think properly included in a parenthesis, that it may not interrupt the main argument. The apostle evidently intended to show that God may justly, and will certainly, punish those sins, which yet eventually prove the occasion of more conspicuously manifesting his glory. Now, if this were not the case, it might be said, "Let us do evil, that good "may come:" but, on the contrary, whatever blasphemers may assert, this proposition is so contrary to the real nature and genius of the Gospel, that every intelligent minister or Christian will be forward to allow the condemnation of those, who thus encourage themselves in sin, under a vain imagination that good will follow, to be undeniably righteous. (Note, vi. 1, 2.) The floodgates of licentiousness are opened by such a view of the Gospel. Even apparently religious persons often tolerate, nay, zealously promote, practices, which cannot be denied to be deviations from truth and integrity, and vindicate them, because good is thus done. In this way the standard of integrity is, (dreadful to say,) fixed lower in some particulars among numbers, who are zealous for the Gospel, than among respectable worldly people, who are, by observing these things, exceedingly prejudiced against evangelical truth. Nay, the same false principle is brought forward, in another and more fashionable form, when utility, and not the law of God, is made the standard of morality, and a main principle of reasonings on moral obligation. It is on these accounts, most obvious to suppose, that the apostle meant, though in a cursory manner, to bear a most decisive testimony against a maxim, which, carried to its consequences, is destructive of all practical religion; and against those, who, professing Christianity, countenanced and acted according to it.

V. 9—18. The apostle here resumes his subject from the second verse. The advantages of the Jews were many; but were they better than the Gentiles, or more able to justify themselves before God by their own works, or without "the righteousness of faith?" This could by no means be admitted: for it had been proved, or rather charged upon both Jews and Gentiles, "that they were all "under sin." They had all, in manifold instances, violated the known rule of their conduct, and were under condemnation as transgressors, unless delivered by the mercy and grace of God. To this indictment, on which the Gentiles had been convicted, the Jews pleaded not guilty: and therefore, to the evidence already brought against them from notorious facts, and the nature of the case, the apostle next produced several passages of the scriptures against them. In these it was not intimated that circumcision, the written law, their ceremonial observances, or their national covenant, would excuse their crimes, or entitle them to the favour of God, as the unbelieving Jews vainly imagined. And if these charges were true of the greater part of the nation in former times, could it be supposed that the Jews, when the apostle wrote, were better by nature, or merely as circumcised, or as having the law, than their fore-fathers had been? It was expressly written of them, that in themselves, and by their works, there was not one of them righteous: that there were none of them who understood the character, truth, and will of God, or their own interest and duty; or who sought to know him, and find happiness in his favour: they had all forsaken the way of holy obedience, they were all become unprofitable, in respect of the great end of their creation and their peculiar advantages; so that none of them employed themselves in glorifying God, and doing good to man. Their throats, by their insatiable luxury, or rather by their filthy communications, resembled the sepulchre when opened to receive the dead, or when emitting its nauseous and infectious vapours. Deceit and dissimulation seemed the main use of their tongues; their slanders, seductions, and flatteries, were under their lips as the fatal poison of asps; instead of pious and kind words, their mouths were filled with imprecations, perjuries, and bitter revilings; they were eager to shed blood, in revenge, ambition or avarice; they knew not the ways in which godly men walk, at peace with God and their neighbours; and therefore they went on in those paths, which lead to misery and ruin, both to themselves and each other. In short, they had cast the fear of God behind their backs, and habitually disregarded his authority, threatenings, precepts, and judgments. (Notes, &c. Ps. v. 9. x. 7. xiv. 1—3. xxxvi. 1. liii. 1—3. cxl. 3. Is. lix. 7, 8.) A few exceptions, by the mercy and grace of God, there doubtless were to these general rules; and the apostle intended very soon to show how these persons were made to differ: but these quotations, were full to the point to show the Jews, that they were as unable to justify themselves before God, as the Gentiles. For if, in the days of David and Isaiah, this had been the general character of the people, the acceptance and holiness of any among them must arise from some other cause than their national covenant and external privileges.

V. 19, 20. It was well known, that the things which were written in the law, or in the Old Testament, were immediately addressed to those who were under the law, and had the benefit of divine revelation; or to the nation of Israel, and not to the Gentiles. This was intended to silence the cavils and objections of the Jews, who brake the law in which they rested; and indeed in this manner “every mouth must be stopped,” and all the world must become, or be proved, guilty before God; as it was not supposed that the Gentiles were more free from guilt than the peculiar people of God. So that in fact every sinner's plea must eventually be silenced, either now as an humble penitent before the mercy-seat, or as a condemned criminal before the judgment-seat of God. From these premises it evidently followed, that no one of the whole fallen race of men could be justified before God by his own obedience to the law; for by the law sin is discovered, exposed, and condemned. The straightness of that perfect rule makes known the crookedness of men's dispositions and actions; and it must therefore convict the transgressor as guilty, instead of pronouncing him not guilty, or a righteous person. Every attentive reader must observe, that the apostle used the word law in a variety of meanings; which is rather to be considered as the defect of human language, than the result of any ambiguity in his style. But the context will generally show how the word is to be understood: and common sense, united with a teachable spirit, will usually determine this better than critical learning; which is too often employed rather to perplex what is plain, than to clear up what is obscure. The nature of the argument requires us to suppose that the apostle means the sacred Scriptures in general, when he saith “what soever the law saith:” for the quotations were not from the law of Moses, and it is evident the whole Old Testament was thus spoken of. (Marg. Ref.) When he spoke of the Jews as “under the law,” he evidently meant the whole legal dispensation, by which they were distinguished from the Gentiles. But when he says, “by the law is the knowledge of sin,” he must be understood of the moral law especially, the extent, spirituality, and excellency of which shows what things are sinful, and how evil sin is: whereas the ceremonial law rather gave the knowledge of salvation, by prefiguring the shedding of that atoning blood, and the communication of that sanctifying grace, by which sin is taken away. Indeed this subject seems capable of an easy solution; if there be any law, which a man hath perfectly kept, he may doubtless be justified by it; and surely no man can be justified by a law which condemns him for breaking it! But there is no law of God which any man hath kept; therefore none, by the deeds of which a man can be justified. The Gentile broke the law of his reason and conscience; the Jew broke the moral law; and even the attempt to justify himself by observing the ceremonial law, contradicted the very nature and intent of it. And as to that new law, which requires sincere obedience as the condition of justification, they who dream of it should show us when it was promulgated, where it may be found, what it requires, whom it can condemn, or whom it can justify. When this is done, it may be worth while to show, that it makes void both the law and the Gospel; that it introduces a new, vague, and unintelligible rule of duty, which every man may interpret according to his own inclinations, that it introduces boasting, and unites together pharisaical pride and antinomian licentiousness. Yet this vague, unscriptural notion, which is replete with such complicated absurdities, so well suits men's natural indolence of thought in matters of religion; serves so conveniently to reconcile a quiet conscience with a worldly life; and so coincides with their enmity against both the holiness of the law, and the humiliating doctrine of the Gospel; that perhaps it deceives more souls, than all other false systems of religion put together, in this superficial dissipated age. ‘By law, ‘which is the publishing of the rule with a penalty, ‘we are not delivered from the power of sin, nor can ‘it help men to righteousness; but by law we come ‘experimentally to know sin, in the power and force ‘of it, since we find it prevail upon us, notwithstanding ‘the punishment of death is annexed to it.’ (Locke.) (Notes, vii.) ‘The knowledge of sin being chiefly by ‘the moral law, (vii. 7,) shows that the apostle excludes ‘that, as well as the ceremonial law, from justifica‘tion; and evident it is, that the antithesis runs all ‘along, not between moral and ceremonial works, but ‘between works in general and faith.’ (Whitby.) No flesh, means none born of fallen Adam's race. (1—5. 9. John iii. 6.)

V. 21—26. The apostle having "concluded all men under sin," proceeds more explicitly to exhibit "the righteousness of God by faith," (Note, i. 17,) which had been manifestly declared by the preaching of the Gospel. This was the righteousness, which God had appointed, provided and introduced, in the Person of his Son. It was "without the law;" having no dependence on a man's personal obedience to the law, being entirely a distinct thing: no past obedience being supposed as having any influence in the sinner's justification; and his subsequent obedience being intended for other purposes. It had nothing to do with the ceremonial law, (except as it was the substance of some of those shadows,) for the Jew, who accepted of this righteousness, would place no dependence on these externals; and the Gentile was not required to be circumcised, or to keep that law. Yet it had been witnessed by the law and the prophets; the ceremonies typified it; the very strictness of the moral law and its awful curses, being compared with the promises of mercy to sinners, implied it; the promises and predictions of the Messiah bore witness to it; the faith and hope of ancient believers testified it; and the whole Old Testament, rightly understood, taught men to expect and depend on it. This "righteousness of God by faith in Jesus" is accounted or imputed to all believers without exception; yea, it is put on them as a robe; for the words "unto, and upon, all," seem to admit of no other construction. Nor is there in this respect any difference between one man and another, however otherwise distinguished; as all have sinned and come short of rendering to God the glory due unto him, all have lost his glorious image, and all have forfeited that glorious felicity, which was annexed to perfect obedience as its reward, (Marg. Ref.) and therefore, whatever the nature or degree of their crimes may have been, or whatever their nation, rank, or capacities be; there is no difference in the way in which they must be justified before God. Every believer is not only pardoned, but honourably acquitted, as one against whom no charge can be supported, and accounted righteous, or entitled to the reward of righteousness. This is by the free gift of God, which he bestows on him, merely from his own infinite grace and mercy; not only without his deserving it, but directly contrary to his deserts, which the apparent tautology, "freely by his grace," seems to denote. This grace is honourably exercised, through the redemption that is in Jesus Christ, or through the ransom and meritorious obedience unto death of the incarnate Son of God, as our Surety; for God the Father had before set him forth, or fore-ordained him, (Marg.) to be a propitiatory sacrifice for sin; he had appointed him to be Mediator, as "God manifest in the flesh," for that purpose: he had openly laid on him the iniquities of us all, and exacted the punishment from him; and he had exhibited this transaction to the world by the Gospel, that, through him, sinners of every nation might approach God on a propitiatory or mercy seat, and find acceptance by faith in the Saviour's atoning blood. This method was taken, in order to declare and manifest the perfect righteousness of God; even in the very act of pardoning the innumerable sins of believers, remitting the punishment due to them, and accounting them righteous, who in themselves were not so. And, whatever the Jews might suppose, this was as necessary in respect of their believing progenitors, as any other sinners. For in remitting the punishment justly merited by the sins committed in times past, through his forbearance, God had neither respect to the repentance nor subsequent good works of his servants, which could not satisfy his justice; nor did he ultimately respect the legal sacrifices, which could not take away sin; but he had respect to the engagements of the divine Surety of the new covenant, and the atonement which he was at length to make. In the fulness of time therefore this sacrifice was offered, this righteousness introduced, and this method of justification published to mankind, that God might be clearly known to be a just and righteous Governor, and yet the Justifier of every sinner who believed in Jesus; which he could not otherwise have been, (Prov. xvii. 15:) for justice in a governor requires, that every man be dealt with according to his real character and actions, except some expedient can be adopted for maintaining the authority of the law and the credit of the administration, and to indemnify individuals, while mercy is exercised to those who deserve punishment. So that ancient believers had been admitted to the reward of righteousness, as well as exempted from the punishment deserved by their sins, for the sake of that promised Redeemer, who had engaged to pay their ransom, and bring in an infinitely valuable and everlasting righteousness for their justification: nor would it otherwise have consisted with the infinite justice of God to deal with them in a manner so very different from their real deservings. This is evidently the apostle's argument; and the concluding verses might be thus translated.

27 [s] Where is boasting then? It is excluded. By what law? [t] of works? Nay; [u] but by the law of faith.

28 Therefore [x] we conclude that a man is justified by faith, without the deeds of the law.

29 Is he [y] the God of the Jews only? Is he not also of the Gentiles? yes, of the Gentiles also:

30 Seeing it is [z] one God, which shall justify the circumcision by faith, and uncircumcision through faith.

31 Do we then [a] make void the law through faith? [b] God forbid: yea, [c] we establish the law.

" Whom God hath before appointed to be a propitiation, " through faith in his blood, for a demonstration of his " justice, on account of the passing by of sins that had " been committed in former times, through the forbear- " ance of God;" I say, " for a demonstration of his " justice in this present time, in order that he might be " just, and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus."— ' Dr. Hammond saith the word δικαιος is here to be ren- ' dered clement and merciful, and that it is commonly ' taken in that notion, and seldom in that of vindictive ' justice; but in opposition to this I assert, that the word ' δικαιος is used about eighty times in the New Testament, ' and not once in that sense of clemency and mercy. He ' himself produces but one place, (Matt. i. 19.) ' Where, ' says Dr. Lightfoot, men torment the word δικαιος to ' make it signify clement and merciful, when it bears ' clearly the ordinary sense. Joseph, being a just man, ' would not cohabit with an adulteress; and yet, not being ' willing to make her a public example, and no necessity ' —lying upon him so to do, he was minded to put her ' away privily.' (Note, Matt. i. 18, 19.) ' That he ' might appear to be just, in requiring this satisfaction ' for our sins.' (Whitby.) Too strong a protest cannot be entered against this practice of giving a new meaning to words in Scripture, in order to get rid of a conclusion, against which the writer happens to be prejudiced: it is absolutely adding to, or taking from, or changing, the word of God; and it perplexes the minds of ordinary readers to such a degree, that the plainest passages seem to them obscure, and of doubtful meaning.

V. 27, 28. The Jews were disposed to boast, as if they had been superior, in nature and excellency, to the Gentiles, instead of considering themselves more highly and undeservedly favoured of God. But the apostle here inquires what reason they had for glorying, seeing even their pious ancestors had been justified by grace, through faith, for the sake of the promised Redeemer and his propitiation. And he determines, that all boasting of any of the human race is excluded, and can have no admission in consistency with truth and justice. It was indeed the express promise of God, that boasting should be shut out, as the rival of his glory; but by what law, or rule of judgment, could this be effected? Was it to be done by " the law of works," or the method of justifying men on the condition of their obedience? This would never answer the end, if it were practicable for any to be thus justified; nay, this would introduce and sanction the boasting of one over another in the things of God. Boasting must therefore be excluded " by the law of faith," not by a remedial law, as some call it, which in fact is a law of works, and introduces boasting; but by justifying believers merely by the grace of God, through the merits of Christ, without any respect to their works, by faith alone of his own gift and operation, and not considered in this matter as an act of obedience or good work, but as forming the relation between Christ and the sinner, which renders it proper that the believer should be pardoned and justified for the sake of the righteousness and ransom of the Saviour; and that the unbeliever who is not thus united or related to him, should remain under condemnation. This is " the " law of faith," or the rule of the divine conduct towards believers and unbelievers; and as God hath determined that " no flesh shall glory in his presence," so, on this ground also, the apostle concluded that a man is justified by faith, and not by the deeds of the law. By what law? ' Or, " by what doctrine," as the Hebrew word Torah is ' sometimes used for the doctrine which any one pre- ' scribes.' (Beza.) It is indeed used with great latitude, even much greater than the word νομος (law,) is in the New Testament. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 29—31. Could any suppose that the great Creator of all men was the God of the Jews only? Was he not also the God of the Gentiles? Being the Proprietor, Governor, and Benefactor of the whole earth, when all men had alike apostatized from him, it was meet, that in revealing a way for their recovery and reconciliation, he should suit it to the general case of all the nations, though special reasons might require a temporary restriction of it; for his object would be to receive worship from, and become the Portion of, his creatures, in different parts of the world. And in fact he was the God of the Gentiles, as well as of the Jews, nor were even external privileges to be restricted to the Jews any longer, seeing the same One, living, and true God, who had formerly, and did at that time, justify those of the circumcision who believed, by their faith, and not by their legal services, and left unbelievers under condemnation, was ready, with equal regard, to justify uncircumcised Gentiles, through faith in Christ, when they were brought thus to receive him. And if any should object that this doctrine of faith made void the law, as if it had been given in vain, the apostle absolutely denied the charge, and would by no means have such a thought be allowed of; on the contrary, this fully established the law in all its honour and authority; neither abrogating it, nor disgracing it, nor altering it to a nearer level with man's present state and abilities. The doctrine of faith indeed honoured and fulfilled the ceremonial law; and showed the proper intent of it, and of the legal dispensation; but, then, this was only in order to their final abrogation. But the moral law was fully established in honour and authority, both in respect of its precepts and sanction, by the perfect obedience and satisfactory sufferings of the incarnate Son of God; so that its immutable obligation, excellency, and equity, could not have been so fully shown, either by the perfect obedience of the whole human species, or by the destruction of every transgressor. Nor is any man justified by faith in Christ, who does not condemn himself, as justly deserving the wrath of God for breaking his holy law. Moreover, it is given into the hands of every believer, as his rule of grateful obedience, by which he is to regulate his temper and conduct, and examine all his actions, that in every thing in which he deviates from this perfect standard, he may repent and seek forgiveness through the blood of Christ. Yea, it is written in his heart by the regeneration of the Holy Spirit, and his love to it, and delight in obeying it, are the evidences of his justification. So that the doctrine of faith in every way magnifies and establishes the just, holy, good, and spiritual law of God, in all its honour and authority, whilst all other schemes of justification disgrace it, or weaken its authority and obligation, as if its precepts were unreasonably strict, and its penalty unrighteously severe. We therefore know what the apostle's doctrine was, because we know what doctrine is objected to, as making void the law; is abused by hypocrites, as loosening man's obligation to holy practice; and yet, when duly understood, establishes the law in the completest manner, and gives the most efficacious motives to all holy obedience.

CHAP. IV.

Justification by faith proved by the example of Abraham, and the words of David, 1—8. Abraham was justified before circumcision, (which was the seal of the righteousness of faith,) that he might be the father of all believers, whether circumcised or not, 9—12. The promise was not given to him through the law, else it had been void; but, being of faith by grace, it is sure to all his spiritual seed in every age and nation, 13—17. The nature and strength of that faith, by which he was justified, 18—22. This was recorded, not for his sake, but to show that all who believe in Christ, as crucified and risen, are justified in like manner, 23—25.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

We ought always to distinguish between our advantages and our deservings, and between the means of becoming accepted and holy, and that grace which teaches to profit by those means. It is a favour of inestimable value, to have the oracles of God transmitted to us; yet numbers, who are thus distinguished, continue in unbelief, to their deeper condemnation. As the promises of God are only made to believers, so the unbelief of some, or many, professed Christians cannot make the faithfulness of God of none effect; for he will fulfil his promises to his people, and execute his threatened vengeance upon hypocrites and apostates. But while pride and enmity charge God foolishly, humble faith says, "God forbid, let God be true, "and every man a liar;" and the believer will give him credit for his truth and justice, even where his dispensations are enveloped in clouds and darkness. Indeed, he readily decides against every man's pretensions or opinions, when they reflect on the veracity, or militate against the word of God, as knowing that every man is fallible, deceitful, and unholy, but that the Lord can neither mistake, deceive, nor be deceived, and that he will be justified from every charge, and overcome in every contest or controversy, which his rebellious creatures may presume to enter into with him. The nature and desert of sin, and the motives and purposes of the sinner, remain precisely the same, when the only wise God has taken occasion from them to manifest more conspicuously his own glory; and his justice also will be glorified in punishing the transgressors. It hath often been slanderously reported of Christians, that they say, "Let us do evil, that good may "come," and "sin on, that grace may be glorified;" but, if true believers, we know that duty belongs to us, and events to God; and that we must not commit any sin, or speak one falsehood, on the hope, or even the assurance, that God would glorify himself by means of it. But if any habitually speak and act in another manner, without all doubt their damnation will be just; and they who love the truth of the Gospel should be extremely careful to avoid all appearances, which may give plausibility to such slanders against our holy religion.

V. 9—20.

Let us remember, that, great as our advantages are, we are no better than benighted heathens, if not worse, except grace have made us to differ: and then to grace the whole praise is due, for it is proved beyond contradiction, that we are all, in ourselves, under sin. The texts here adduced, too exactly describe the bulk of nominal Christians; their want of conformity to the law of God, and of understanding in the great concerns of religion, and their indisposition to seek after his favour and image, their unprofitableness, and working of mischief, instead of doing good. Their filthy, profane, dissembling, slanderous, boasting, and flattering words; their oaths, perjuries, curses, and bitter revilings; their revenge, murders, duels, fightings, and delight in war; their mischievous and destructive courses, and their ignorance of the way of peace and holiness, too evidently prove that there is no fear of God before their eyes. So that he, who examines the state of society, even in this Christian country, nay, he who inquires seriously into the disposition of his own heart, and the tenour of his past and present life, comparing them with the holy law of God, will easily perceive that his mouth, and every mouth, must be stopped, and all the world must be brought in guilty before God. How plain then is it to common sense, that "by "the works of the law shall no flesh be justified before God!"

WHAT [a] shall we then say that [b] Abraham, our father [c] as pertaining to the flesh, hath found?

2 For if Abraham [d] were justified by works, [e] he hath whereof to glory, [f] but not before God.

3 For [g] what saith the scripture? [h] Abraham believed God, and it was [i] counted unto him for righteousness.

V. 21—31.

* * *

Blessed be the Lord that he hath not left our fallen race shut up under sin, without hope or help. For "now the righteousness of God without the law is manifested;" and those alone are truly wise, who plead guilty at his mercy-seat, and seek "that righteousness of God by faith in Jesus Christ, which is unto, and upon, all that believe, without any difference." Proud men will be offended at this, and strive to establish some distinction between themselves and more scandalous or vulgar sinners; but they labour in vain, for "all have sinned and come short of the glory of God," and the meanest and vilest of the human species, who comes in God's appointed and manifested way, shall be "justified freely by his grace, through the redemption of his Son;" while all, who persist in the attempt of justifying themselves, will assuredly perish under the wrath of God. This is a plan equally suited to glorify the justice, holiness, and mercy of our God; and to give encouragement to the broken-hearted, self-condemned criminal. Thus all they, who of old obtained a good report, found righteousness and salvation; thus the believer's felicity is secured, boasting is excluded, despair obviated, and the Lord shown to be the God of all nations, with equal regard, making no other distinction in his final decision, than that which subsists between believers and unbelievers. And whatever Pharisees, Sadducees, or infidels may object, whatever Antinomians, or Enthusiasts may pretend, the doctrine of faith alone establishes the law in its real honour, and lays the true foundation for all holy obedience.

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1—3. The apostle had before intimated, that the favours shown to pious persons of old, had a reference to the righteousness and redemption of Christ, (Note, iii. 21—26.) and he here proceeds to show this more especially in respect of Abraham, the most renowed progenitor of Israel. 'From this single example of Abraham, as deservedly selected from among all the fathers, the apostle intended to draw a conclusion, which would necessarily take in all believers. And that he might do this fairly, he intimates, at the very entrance of the question, that he did not propose Abraham merely as one of the number of believers, but as the father of the Church, that he might properly reason from the father to his children, the foundation of which he lays in the thirteenth verse. In whatever way Abraham, the father of believers was justified, in the same must all his children, (that is, all believers,) be justified; but Abraham was not justified and made the father of the faithful by any of his own works, either preceding or following his faith in Christ, as promised to him; but merely by faith in Christ, or the merit of Christ by faith imputed to him for righteousness. Therefore all his children become his children, and are justified, not by their works, either preceding or following their faith, but by faith alone in the same Christ, who was at length to come;—and thus they are at present justified, and shall be to the end of the world.' (Beza.) The original seems to connect the words, "according to the flesh," with the verb found. "What shall we say? that Abraham our father hath found according to the flesh?" and some would explain it exclusively of his circumcision, 'By virtue of his obedience to God's command, in circumcising his foreskin.' (1 Cor. x. 18. 2 Cor. v. 16. xi. 18. Phil. iii. 3, 4.) 'In this the Jews had the greatest confidence of being acceptable to God, declaring that no circumcised Jews go to hell.' (Whitby.) The apostle had doubtless respect to these arrogant prejudices of his countrymen in this argument; but if circumcision exclusively had been intended, he would hardly have allowed that Abraham might have had whereof to glory, if he had been justified by his obedience in that single instance, and not by his faith. It may therefore be supposed, that all those formal and proud works, however distinguished, by which men in every age seek justification before God, were intended by the words "according to the flesh." Did Abraham find righteousness or justification in this way? Surely no; why then should any man, who allows this, seek to be justified by such works? As all really good works are "the fruits of the Spirit," and none else are called good works in Scripture, and as it is especially the office of the Holy Spirit to convince men of sin, and to glorify Christ, it may be inferred that "the fruits of the Spirit" are never expressly and allowedly depended on for justification. Even the proposition, 'Good works are the fruits of faith, and follow after faith' in Christ, though a general truth, may admit of some exception, in such cases as that of Cornelius. (Notes, Acts x. 1—4.) 'This interrogation, being not formally answered, must be taken as an answer to itself; "What do we say? that Abraham found according to the flesh?" 'No, certainly he did not.' (Hammond.) No Jew would deny that Abraham was at least one of the most eminent servants of God mentioned in Scripture; if therefore any of them had been justified by works, it might be supposed that he belonged to that company. And if this had indeed been the case, he would have had some ground of glorying above others, which was contrary to the doctrine before taught, (iii. 27.) but in fact, however distinguished he had been in various respects, he had really nothing to boast of in the presence of God; being a sinner saved by grace, through faith, even as other men. For, not to argue from the years which had preceded his calling, the original source of his being made to differ from his former neighbours, or the failures in his subsequent obedience, and even in his faith, it was evident, from express Scripture, that "he believed God, and it was counted to him for righteousness," (Note, Gen. xv.

4 Now [k] to him that worketh, is the reward not reckoned of grace, but of debt.

5 But [l] to him that worketh not, but [m] believeth on him that justifieth [n] the ungodly, [o] his faith is counted for righteousness.

6.) The promise of God, his perfections as engaged to perform it, and the promised Seed through whom the blessings were bestowed, were the objects of his faith; this formed his relation to the Messiah, and interested him in the righteousness which he had engaged to perform, and therefore it was imputed to him for righteousness, as if he had personally satisfied divine justice, and perfectly answered all the demands of God's holy law. But if Abraham, though greatly distinguished among men, had no ground of glorying before God, much less had his posterity any ground of glorying in him as their father, while they refused to walk in his steps. Thus the apostle, by this single example, struck at the very root of their national vain confidence in Abraham, as their Father in circumcision, and in the law of Moses.

V. 4, 5. From the example of Abraham, the apostle observed, that to a man, (if there had been any such,) who had worked the full measure required by the law, the reward must be adjudged, as a debt due to him by the terms of that covenant, whereas it was obvious that it was adjudged to Abraham as a favour, seeing "faith was "imputed to him for righteousness;" and this was the general case of believers. For to the man who worketh not, but, conscious that he can advance no claim of this kind to the desired reward, comes as a sinner, to "believe "in him who justifieth the ungodly," his faith is counted to him for righteousness, not on account of its own excellency or worthiness as a good work, but as it refers the sovereign Judge for payment to the accepted righteousness and atonement of his Son: even as the receipt of a scrap of paper, intrinsically not worth a farthing, in the form of a draft upon a creditable banker, is entered in the merchant's book for a considerable sum of money, as if it had been paid in cash. This man, "who worketh not," will indeed diligently use appointed means of grace, repent, forsake sin with earnestness, conscientiously perform his several duties, and even become "zealous of good works;" yet he worketh not at all with an aim, or expectation, of obtaining righteousness in this way, which he knows to be absolutely impossible. But he comes to God, as "the "Justifier of the ungodly," that he may obtain the gift of righteousness by faith, of mere grace, through the merits of the divine Surety. He is not indeed absolutely ungodly at the time of his justification, for his humiliation, submission, and faith, are effects of regeneration, which is the source of all godliness in a fallen creature. Yet he is justified as ungodly in himself, in strict justice, and according to the law; he comes for the blessing as ungodly; God makes no account of any thing in justifying him, except his faith, as forming his relation to Christ, and the man has no respect to any thing else himself, in expecting that blessing. Nay, the justified believer, whatever his holiness or diligence may be, never works for this purpose; and he still comes before God as ungodly in this respect, still desiring and depending on "the righteousness of God "by faith in Christ," as his only hope, though his good works are evidences of the sincerity of his faith. Abraham, several years before, "by faith, obeyed" the call and command of God, and therefore could not be, strictly speaking, altogether ungodly, when it was said, "He be- "lieved God, and it was counted to him for righteousness;" so that the example of Abraham is alone a full and clear refutation of the construction by some put on this text, that men are altogether and in every sense ungodly and unregenerate, at the time when God justifies them; a sentiment of most dangerous tendency. "He that worketh," 'that is, who hath deserved any thing by his work, to 'him is opposed "he that worketh not;" 'that is, who 'brings no work, for which he claims a reward, but de- 'pends on the gratuitous promise of God. But this indeed 'is spoken, by concession, in a similitude taken from the 'commerce and contracts of men; for otherwise, "Who "hath first given? and it shall be rendered to him again." (Beza.)

V. 6–8. This quotation from the thirty-second Psalm, and the apostle's interpretation of it, come in as a parenthesis. David did not pronounce those men happy, who had never sinned, or who had done works to cover their sins, and to justify themselves; but he "described the "blessedness of the man, to whom God imputed right- "eousness without works," when he declared that man happy, whose sins were forgiven, &c. Not that forgiveness of sins is equivalent to justification; which implies also treating a man as righteous, and entitled to the reward of eternal life; for it is evident, in all human transactions, that the pardon of a criminal is a very distinct thing from giving him the title to a large estate. But God always imputes righteousness where he does not impute sin; for none are pardoned, except in virtue of their relation to Christ by faith; and if his atoning blood cover their sins, his righteousness also justifies their persons. As their Surety he suffered for their sins, which were imputed to him, and they are rewarded and made heirs of eternal life, because his righteousness is imputed to them. (Note, Ps. xxxii. 1, 2.) 'From hence the expression of 'blotting out iniquity, so frequently used in Scripture, may 'be understood: that is, the striking it out of the account.' (Locke.)

V. 9—12. The Jews not only supposed that righteousness was by works, but that the privileges of God's people were inseparably connected with circumcision; the apostle therefore next inquired at what time Abraham's "faith "was reckoned to him for righteousness?" And the answer was undeniable, for it appeared from the scripture before cited, that he was justified at least fourteen years before his circumcision; the former having been some time before Ishmael's birth, the other when Ishmael was thirteen years of age. It was therefore manifest, that circumcision was not necessary in order to justification; and indeed Abraham had received from God this instituted ordinance, to be an outward sign of the grace given him, and a seal of the righteousness of faith imputed to him, when in uncircumcision. (Note, Gen. xvii.) This demonstrates that circumcision sealed spiritual blessings to Abraham personally, as the outward seal of the covenant of grace, and the emblem of sanctification, however it might otherwise be applied or understood. 'This seems an in'contestable proof, that circumcision was the seal of the 'covenant of grace, and not merely of temporal promises, 'and consequently obviates the most considerable objection 'that hath ever been urged against infant-baptism.' (Doddridge.) This seal was also a pledge to Abraham of the performance of the promise respecting his seed, especially his spiritual seed of true believers. He was therefore justified before he was circumcised, that he might be the father of all those true believers, who should have the circumcision of the heart, but not the circumcision of the flesh, that they might inherit all his blessing; and he was afterwards circumcised, that he might be the father of the circumcision also, not merely the natural progenitor of the nation of Israel, but the spiritual father of all true believers among them, who walked after the example of his obedient faith, which he had before circumcision, but many of them subsequent to it, that it might be to them the seal of the righteousness of faith, though not to those who had only the outward sign, and not the inward grace signified by it.

V. 13. The world cannot here mean the land of Canaan, which is never so called; but in Abraham and his Seed all the nations of the earth are blessed. Abraham was the root and specimen of all that multitude, all over the earth, to whom the most valuable blessings were to be confined, and who may be said to be heirs of the world. He was, as it were, the repository, in whom all these blessings were first laid up for their advantage; and also the progenitor of Christ "the King of kings and Lord of "lords," and "Heir of all things." This distinction was not given to Abraham through the law, (for that was not promulgated till long after,) nor to his posterity as under the law, for many of them would be excluded for their sins; but it was given to him through the righteousness of faith, and they were the true seed who partook of that same distinction.

V. 14—17. The apostle further argues, that if all they, and they only, who were under the legal dispensation, were heirs, faith, which the scripture assigned as the immediate cause of Abraham's justification, would be made ineffectual. 'It is made void to them who are not 'of the law, because then they cannot by it be made 'heirs; and it is also made void to them that are of the 'law, because they were heirs before, and may still be 'so without it.' (Whitby.) Indeed, whether the law of reason or tradition, (under which Abraham was,) or the law of Moses, be considered, instead of giving any man an interest in the promises of God, it must necessarily expose him to condemnation. For "the law worketh "wrath," by showing that every transgressor is exposed to the righteous indignation of God; and the clearer, the more copious, and express, the law is, the more numerous, evident, and aggravated, must his transgressions appear.

18 Who [x] against hope believed in hope, that he might become the father of many nations; according to that which was spoken, [y] So shall thy seed be.

19 And, [z] being not weak in faith, [a] he considered not his own body now dead, when he was about an hundred years old, neither yet the deadness of Sara's womb:

20 He [b] staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief; [c] but was strong in faith, giving glory to God:

*21 And being [d] fully persuaded, that what he had promised [e] he was able also to perform.

22 And therefore [f] it was imputed to him for righteousness.

23 Now [g] it was not written for his sake alone, that it was imputed to him;

24 But for us also, to whom it shall be imputed, [h] if we believe on him that raised up Jesus our Lord from the dead;

If a man could be without any law, he would not be arraigned and condemned as a criminal; for, as sin is the transgression of the law, so no transgression could be charged upon him who is under no law. But as this cannot be the case of any, so all men are liable to condemnation; for every man's rule worketh wrath against him for acting contrary to it, till he flees for refuge to Christ, who delivers believers from the condemnation of the law, though not from their obligation to obey it. As therefore God intended to give sinners a title to the promised blessings, so he appointed it to be by faith, that it might be wholly of grace, in order to ensure it to all the seed of Abraham, even to all who should ever be made partakers of like precious faith with him, not only to those who lived under the legal dispensation, but to all others throughout the earth, and in every age of the world. This accorded to the promise, that Abraham should be "the father of many nations; for though several nations naturally descended from him, yet this promise had a far nobler and more sublime accomplishment in the immense multitude from so many nations, who have been, are, and hereafter shall be, interested in the blessings first conferred on him, in behalf of himself, and all that should resemble him by a living faith. This was the state of the case, (before that God in whom Abraham believed,) as to the relation of the whole church to him; for God not only quickeneth the dead in sin, and so raises up children to Abraham from the nations that were dead in their idolatry and iniquity, but "He calleth those things "which be not, as though they were," and so had all the unnumbered millions of future believers, as it were, present before him, in respect of his fore-knowledge and pre-determination, when he made the promise to Abraham, and considered him as the father, and them as the family, to whom the inheritance of the blessing was ensured through faith.

V. 18—22. The nature and power of Abraham's faith are next stated. He believed the testimony of God, and expected the performance of his promise, when the case seemed hopeless, and when there was nothing to oppose to the most formidable objections and apparent impossibilities but the bare word of God. He hoped to become the father of many nations, naturally, in his posterity, and spiritually, through Christ who was to descend from him, because God had said, that his seed should be innumerable as the stars of heaven. Yet many years had elapsed since the same promise, for substance, was given, and he still continued without any child by Sarah, to whose offspring the promise was restricted. She had been barren all her younger years, and was then become incapable of bearing children, according to the common course of nature, and he was now grown old, and unlikely to have any; yet, though he had been tried by such long delays, and was discouraged by such immense difficulties, he did not weakly stagger at the promise through unbelief; he hesitated not most confidently to expect that God would be as good as his word; being marvellously strengthened in his faith, he gave glory to God, and honoured all his perfections, by a full assurance that he was able to perform what he had promised; and therefore "his faith was imputed to him for right-"eousness." That is, his faith was thus approved to be genuine, meet to form a relation between him and the predicted Redeemer, and therefore it marked him out as a proper person to be justified by the everlasting righteousness which the Messiah would introduce. It is evident, from the whole context, that Abraham's faith did not justify him by its own merit or value, but as interesting him in Christ; for, though the sincerity of his faith was manifested on this occasion, he had actually been justified long before, and his example could not aptly illustrate the Christian's justification by the merits of Christ, and not by those of his own faith, if we do not thus understand it. A very common perversion of this passage must not pass unnoticed. Many speak of "hoping against hope," not that God will fulfil his promises to believers, notwithstanding all difficulties and improbabilities, but that themselves are believers and shall be saved, contrary to the evidence of their tempers and lives, and this is often the grossest presumption and fanaticism imaginable, though sometimes used by those who are not aware of its tendency.

V. 23—25. The history of Abraham and of his justification was not written for his sake, as he had been dead long before Moses recorded it; but it was intended for the instruction for all future generations, and of those especially to whom the Gospel was preached. For in case they believed in that God, who had raised Christ from the dead, and who was able to fulfil his largest promises, their faith would be imputed to them for righteousness, even as that of Abraham had been; for this faith, if genuine, would form a relation between them and the Lord Jesus, and

CHAP. V.

Being justified by faith, we have peace with God, rejoice in hope, and rejoice in tribulations, 1—5. The rich love of God to us when sinners, in reconciling us to himself by the death of his Son, assures us of final salvation, and leads us to rejoice in him, 6—11. As sin and death come upon all men by Adam; so the grace of God, which justifieth unto life, with all concurrent blessings, comes more abundantly on all believers by Jesus Christ, 12—19. The law proved an occasion to the abounding of sin unto death; but this made way for the still greater abounding of grace, as reigning through righteousness unto eternal life by Christ, 20, 21.

THEREFORE, [a] being justified by faith, [b] we have peace with God, [c] through our Lord Jesus Christ:

2 By [d] whom also we have access by faith into this grace [e] wherein we stand, [f] and rejoice in hope of [g] the glory of God.

give them an interest in his mediatorial work. For, as Jesus had been delivered up to death, by man, as a criminal, but by the Father as a sacrifice for the offences of his people, so he had been raised again for their justification: he was thus perfectly justified from the charges brought against him, and the acceptance of his righteousness and redemption was demonstrated; and in this all his people were interested, for the justification of the Surety was eventually effectual for the justification of all those who were represented by him, to which privilege every one is actually admitted, when he truly believes the Gospel.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12.

No mere man, since the fall, could ever find any thing but death by his own works, and the history contained in the Scriptures, and the confessions of the best of men, prove that all, who have been saved, escaped condemnation and obtained heaven by "faith being imputed to them for "righteousness." In all controversies we should inquire, "What say the oracles of God?" These uniformly teach, that the reward is not assigned to a man for working, as a debt, but through believing, as of grace. None can sincerely pray for this blessing, till he ceases from working in order to justify himself, and indeed no man performs good works from pure principles, till he learns to believe "in "him who justifieth the ungodly." Yet at the same time no true believer will neglect working, in order to glorify God, to do good, and to make his own calling and election sure. Man's felicity consists in the favour of God, which can belong to none of our fallen race, except the pardoned sinner; and the forgiveness of sin, and the imputation of righteousness without works, are entirely through the obedience unto death of our gracious Redeemer. They who obtain this blessedness, are happy, though poor, despised, and afflicted; all who come short of it are most miserable, however wealthy, honoured, and prospered. This distinction extends to all nations, sects, or forms of worship; some are justified, and some are not, in all companies where the great truths of the Gospel are known; and this method of justifying the ungodly is equally suited to preclude the most eminent saints from glorying, and the most atrocious sinners from despairing.

V. 13—25.

The seal of the Holy Spirit in sanctification is the inward evidence "of the righteousness of faith;" when the old nature is crucified, and the heart is circumcised to love God, it is evident that we are the children of Abraham, and walk in his steps; and sacraments will be really seals and pledges of the same blessing. Blessed be God, that we are not left under the covenant of works. For the more holy and perfect the law, the greater wrath would in that case come upon us; but as all is of grace, it is through faith, and the promised blessing is ensured to all the chosen seed, wherever dispersed, or however distinguished. May we then copy the example of Abraham, and in the midst of perils and difficulties "in hope believe "against hope," assured that God is both able and willing to perform his promises to all who trust in him, and wait the accomplishment of them in patient obedience. Thus our faith will be imputed to us for righteousness, through him who died for our offences, and rose again for our justification.

NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 1, 2. The apostle, having stated and confirmed his doctrine concerning justification, here proceeds to show the happiness of those who are thus justified. When the sinner believes in Jesus, his "faith is imputed "to him for righteousness;" thus he is justified before God, accounted a righteous person, and entitled to the reward of righteousness. In consequence of this, "he "hath peace with God," the controversy, or hostility, which sin hath excited, is terminated by a blessed pacification through the great Mediator, and a covenant of amity is ratified between that holy God, who had so just cause to treat his rebellious creature as an enemy, and that rebel, who before was so unreasonably alienated from his beneficent Creator. The sinner submits, pleads guilty, seeks mercy, and learns to love and serve God; and his offended Sovereign receives him to full favour and thenceforth behaves to him as his Friend and Father. The sinner, being thus reconciled, considers the cause and people of God as his own, and separates from his enemies, that he may be united to his friends: he makes the glory of his God the ultimate end of his habitual conduct, and God protects, countenances, provides for, and communes with the believer as his friend, and requites the injuries or favours done to him as if done to himself. All this centres in the Person, mediation, and grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath made and preserves this blessed peace. Thus every true believer has actually found admission into a state of full favour with God, even as if he had never sinned; in this he stands accepted before him, and is secured by his promise and grace from being cast down from it; and he learns to rejoice in the prevailing, abiding, and realizing hope of being glorified with God, and glorifying him; of completely bearing his glorious image, and of enjoying his unspeakable love to all eternity. The expressions may also allude to the free access of sinners, from different nations, into the full enjoyment of the privileges of God's people, without any respect to the legal ceremonies and restrictions in approaching his mercy-seat. The word rendered rejoice more properly signifies glory, or boast. (Note, Jer. ix. 23, 24.) Boasting or glorying in ourselves is excluded, that, by the free grace of God, we may glory and exult in the hope of heavenly felicity, in our very trials, in Christ Jesus, and in God as our God and Portion.

V. 3—5. The primitive Christians not only rejoiced or exulted in hope of the glory of God, notwithstanding present afflictions, but they gloried in the tribulations themselves, as the sure pledges of the divine favour and means of spiritual improvement. For they were assured, from the word of God and from the evidence of facts, that their trials and persecutions produced submission to the divine will, and acquiescence in it, meekness amidst injuries and provocations, and "patient continuance in "well-doing," and quietly waiting for the Lord amidst all difficulties, perils, and sufferings. Their trials indeed might at first excite impatience; but, by watching and praying, they would overcome it, and thus be brought into a patience of spirit through trials, as the rough block is wrought into a beautiful statue by the chisel and labour of the workman. At the same time this patience produced an enlarged experience, an experimental acquaintance with their own weakness and sinfulness, in order to their humiliation; of the reality and power of grace in their hearts after repeated trials in the furnace; of the faithfulness of God to his promises; and of his readiness to answer their prayers. So that these painful dispensations tended still further to establish the hope of glory, and to assure them that this hope would never make them ashamed, by vanishing in disappointment, like the baseless confidence of a worldly man, of a Pharisee, an unbelieving Jew, or a hypocrite. For the hope of the tried and experienced believer is not only warranted by the word of God, but sealed upon his heart by the gift of the Holy Spirit, by whose sacred influences the excellency and loving-kindness of God, especially in the work of redemption, are so discovered to him, and diffused or poured out through all the faculties of his soul, as to produce a similarity of disposition, a reciprocal love of the divine perfections, a longing desire of the favour of God, a delight in communing with and serving him, a lively gratitude for his benefits, and zeal for his glory; these being full proofs of regeneration, the inward "seal of the righteousness of faith," and earnests of heavenly felicity, ensure the Christian's hope from the shame of disappointment. Most expositors interpret this clause, ("the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts, "&c.") exclusively of the perception and sense of the love of God to us, which is vouchsafed by the Holy Spirit. Yet our love to God, as "the fruit of the Spirit," writing his law in our hearts, is in fact the only indisputable proof that our hope will never make us ashamed. The seal and consolations of the Spirit are distinguished from all enthusiastical delusions and false affections, by their permanently sanctifying effects; no supposed sense of God's love to us, except as attended with the consciousness of loving him, can warrant a scriptural assurance; and the Spirit of adoption is doubtless a Spirit of love to God, as well as confidence in him. (Note, viii. 14—17.) It must therefore be evident, that the work of the Holy Spirit, in changing our natural enmity against God into supreme love of him, must be intended, either as the primary meaning of the clause, or as the inseparable effect of a genuine sense and perception of the love of God to us. (Marg. Ref.) It cannot be supposed that the apostle mentioned this triumphant confidence as the habitual attainment of all justified persons, but rather as an invaluable privilege consequent on justification, which must be sought with diligence and earnestness, and which is actually enjoyed nearly in proportion as it is thus sought. The sufferings of believers, especially from persecution, form one grand objection to what is spoken in Scripture concerning their happiness, in the opinion of men in general. To select, therefore, these very trials, as one ground of the Christian's glorying and rejoicing, was peculiarly suited to meet that objection, and to produce a great effect on the reader's mind and heart.

V. 6, 7. It might perhaps be objected, that, after all, it was not impossible, nor even highly improbable, that the believer's hope should terminate in disappointment and shame, through the prevalence of in-dwelling sin and the power of temptation, and that Satan might, at length, induce him to apostatize. Some constitutional or habitual iniquity, which in more favourable circumstances had been kept under with great difficulty, might at length obtain the ascendency through his unwatchfulness, and so destroy him, or he might fall away in the hour of death, or at some other critical season. The apostle therefore digresses, in order to obviate this objection, and at the same time he shows what abundant reason believers have to love their God and Saviour. When they, who are now at peace with God, lay in the ruins of the fall, under deserved wrath, and the power of sin and Satan, without any strength to resist, or to deliver themselves, when they had neither natural power for so vast a work, if they had been inclinable to it, nor moral ability or inclination to attempt it, when thus impotent and helpless, and dead in sin, they could have no refuge but in the mere compassion of God, and yet were ungodly, and without any proper disposition of heart towards him, nay, every way contrary to his nature, will, and worship; when they were too proud even to ask for mercy, or to allow their need of it, and too averse to religion, to be at all willing to become spiritual worshippers; even then Christ died for them, in their stead, a sacrifice for their sins, and to make way for their salvation! For though some of those, for whom Christ died, were previously gone to heaven, others were godly persons then living on earth, and others had not come into existence: yet they were all considered as ungodly, and without strength, in respect of Christ's dying for them. They all stood, as it were, present before God, according to his omniscience, fore-knowledge, and pre-determination, in their natural state of impenitent ungodliness, and Christ, as their divine and righteous Surety, took their sins upon himself, and engaged to atone for them, before they knew their own lost condition, and without any solicitation from them. In this sense he is "the Lamb slain "from the foundation of the world." The believers who lived before his coming not only were pardoned and saved through his engagement in their behalf, but their repentance, faith, and grace, as the effects of regeneration, sprang from the same source. At length, "in due "time," the season appointed by the only wise God, he appeared on earth, and "died for the ungodly; and by his Spirit sinners are quickened from the death of sin, repent, believe, love, and obey: but all comes to them through his atonement and intercession.

V. 8—10. To illustrate the immensity of this love of God, the apostle shows, that if "a righteous man," one of strict integrity, who had committed no crime against the welfare of the community, were about to be unjustly put to death, there would scarcely be found a person who would consent to die in his stead; though perhaps for a good man, one of extensive philanthropy, whose life had been and was likely to be a public blessing, some might even venture to lay down their lives. This has sometimes been done in the field of battle, and perhaps it would be possible to find a man, who would, in such cause, suffer for his friend or benefactor upon a scaffold. Yet this most rare instance, the very summit of human affection, is immensely beneath the love of God to us. He, who should give up his life in these circumstances, would do it for one of superior excellency, or who had greatly befriended him, and his death would ensure honour and applause to his memory. But the infinitely glorious God had commended, or set off to the utmost advantage, his love to us, in that his incarnate and co-equal Son gave himself to endure the most agonizing and ignominious death for those who were infinitely beneath him, his creatures that had rebelled against him, and persisted in that ungrateful rebellion: yea, impenitent sinners, who had perpetrated the most atrocious and multiplied crimes to provoke his vengeance, and whose state of heart rendered them the meet objects of his abhorrence. Yet he had freely loved them, and purposed their salvation, and when his justice and holiness, and the honour of his law, obstructed that gracious design, he so loved them, that he gave his own Son to die a sacrifice for their sins! (Notes, &c. Gen. xxii. John xv. 13—5.) Now, if this was so, and they by divine grace had been brought to repent, and to believe in Christ, and had thus been justified through the shedding of his blood, by faith in that great atonement; much more then would they be kept from falling again under the wrath of God, and perishing in sin, through him who died for them and rose again. For could it be imagined that He, who so loved them when enemies, as to die for them, would not save and uphold them by his almighty power, now they were made friends? If, when they were not only destitute of godliness, and impenitent transgressors, but enemies to the holy character, law, sovereignty, grace, providence, and cause of God, they had been brought into a state of reconciliation and cordial peace with him, by the death of his Son upon the cross, much more would they, being thus reconciled, be preserved from falling under the power of Sin and Satan, or finally apostatizing, "by his life," his intercession, authority, and omnipotent grace. (Note, John x. 27—30.) He, that had done the greater work for his enemies, would surely do the less difficult for his friends and children, and the living Lord would complete the purpose of his dying love, by saving all believers to the uttermost, till his finished ransom on the cross should terminate in their finished salvation, as "presented faultless before his pre-"sence with exceeding joy." There could be no danger of a reconciled believer falling under the wrath of God, but on supposition that he should commit sin, and die without repentance; but had Christ suffered, and denied, and humbled himself, even to death upon the cross, that he might bring him into this state of reconciliation? and would he, after all, so leave him to himself, and in the hands of the wicked one, as thus finally to perish, when his living power could prevent it, without any suffering or self-denial whatever? Some expositors insert, 'If we be 'not wanting to ourselves.' But first, Is not this adding to the Scripture? And, secondly, Does not this lead us to trust in our own hearts, instead of trusting in God, to "hold "us up, that we may be safe?"

V. 11. Having such a pledge of future and complete salvation in the love of God through Christ, and in past mercies experienced, the apostle declared that he, and other established believers, not only rejoiced and exulted in the hope of heaven, and in their tribulations for Christ's sake, but they gloried in God also, as their unchangeable Friend and all-sufficient Portion; but this was not by the works of the law, as the Jew made his boast in God, but "through "our Lord Jesus Christ." For, according to the law, they were all sinners and enemies, but by Christ they had now "received the reconciliation." (Marg.) This is the proper translation of the sentence, which refers to the whole of the pacification between God and the believing sinner, through the mediation of Christ, and not merely to the atonement which is the ground of it. As they were confident that the great Peace-maker, who had effected this reconciliation by the blood of his cross and the power of his grace, would certainly preserve it, they gloried in God through him, as their God and everlasting Portion. To explain all this of the Gentiles exclusively, as if the Jews did not want a reconciliation, makes the apostle speak of himself as a Gentile; and indeed it is so unscriptural and irrational, that one cannot but be surprised to find men of great learning and talents contend for it.

V. 12—14. In order more fully to illustrate his important subject, the apostle calls the reader's attention to the state of man from the fall of Adam. He was the federal head, surety, and representative of all his posterity; nor was sin entered, save to the personal condemnation of Eve, till he also had eaten the forbidden fruit. (Notes, Gen. iii.) By that one man sin entered into the world, to pollute and ruin the whole human species: and so death, spiritual and temporal, followed and passed upon all men, "for that," (or, as some translate it, "in whom,) all had sinned." In Adam, as being in his loins when he thus apostatized, we all sinned and fell under condemnation: his blood was attainted for rebellion; and thence that evil nature originated, from which all our personal transgressions proceed. In proof of this our union with Adam, and our concern in his first transgression, which the proud heart of man is prone to deny or object to with blasphemous enmity, it should be observed, that for two thousand five hundred years before the giving of the law, sin prevailed in the world, and was punished with death: but sin cannot be imputed where no law is, of which it is a transgression. None of the immense multitudes, who died between the fall of Adam and the promulgation of the law, could personally violate the prohibition, to which the penalty of death had been annexed; yet were they included in the sentence denounced against Adam, and after much toil and suffering returned to the dust whence they were taken. And though adults might be thought to die for their personal violation of the law of tradition, or of their own reason: yet, during this long interval, an innumerable multitude had been subjected to death, who had never broken any law, after the similitude of Adam's transgression, that is, wilfully and deliberately. For the number of infants, that had been cut off, with great pain and agony, previously to their commission of actual sin, had been immensely great. They had been involved in the destruction of the old world, and of Sodom and Gomorrah; and in the ordinary course of things death reigned over them, before they were capable of wilful deliberate transgression: and this fact could not be otherwise accounted for, consistently with the divine perfections, than by allowing them, as one with Adam, to have fallen in him under condemnation, through his violation of that covenant, in which he acted as surety for all his offspring. There may indeed be a comfortable hope, that as infants die in Adam without their own personal transgression, so they will be saved in Christ without their own personal exercise of faith in him; as never living to be capable of it: yet that change must be wrought in them by the regenerating Spirit, which would have produced faith in him had they lived longer. Indeed the sufferings and death of infants in every age form an irrefragable proof of original sin: but it was more peculiarly so, from Adam to Moses; as that law was not then in being, which in some instances entailed the guilt of the parents on their children, to the third and fourth generation. Yet these laws were deduced from the same principle of the oneness between the root and the branches; though only applied in some special cases, whilst that of Adam reached in general to all his posterity. For he was a figure or type, of him, who was to come, as the Surety of a new covenant, in behalf of all related to him. In many respects Adam might be considered as the contrast of Christ; but he resembled him, and was his type in the divine prescience, by acting as the surety of all related and united to him: for thus Christ acted as the Surety of all his people, who are deemed his spiritual progeny, and they are interested in his obedience, sufferings, victories, and exaltation.—'Adam is compared with Christ, both in what is similar, 'and what is contrary. They are alike in this; that each 'of them shares what he has with his: they are clearly 'unlike in this, that Adam by nature communicates sin

15 But [q] not as the offence, so also is the free gift. For if through the offence of one [r] many be dead; much more the grace of God, [s] and the gift by grace, which is by one man, Jesus Christ, [t] hath abounded unto many.

16 And not as it was by one that sinned, so is the gift: [u] for the judgment was by one to condemnation; [x] but the free gift is of many offences unto justification.

17 For if [y] by * one man's offence death reigned by one; much more they which receive [z] abundance of grace, and of the [a] gift of righteousness, [b] shall reign in life by one, Jesus Christ:

18 Therefore, as by † the offence of one, judgment came [c] upon all men to condemnation; even so by ‡ the righteousness of one, the free gift came upon [d] all men unto justification of life.

19 For [e] as by one man's disobedience many were made sinners; [f] so by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous.

'unto death to his posterity, but Christ by grace communicates his righteousness to his people unto life.' (Beza.) Many learned men explain what is said of death as meaning only mortality; but do we not all derive a depraved, as well as a mortal nature, from Adam? And does not Christ save his people from guilt and depravity, as well as from mortality? And will immortality, without justification and sanctification, be any blessing? If we are depraved, or dead in sin, and mortal, as Adam's descendants, we must not only die, but be miserable and unholy for ever, without the salvation of Christ.

V. 15—19. The chief difficulty, which renders the expositions generally given of these verses perplexed and unsatisfactory, arises from an evident misconception of the apostle's reasoning, in supposing that Adam and Christ represented exactly the same company: whereas Adam was the surety of the whole human species; Christ only of that chosen remnant, which hath been, or shall be, one with him by faith. Indeed, all men, in consequence of the undertaking of Christ, are under a dispensation of mercy, and are "endured with much long-suffering;" they are not left desperate, have many temporal mercies, and shall all arise to judgment. There is also such an infinite sufficiency in the atonement of Christ, and it is so proposed to sinners, as a common salvation for all who will accept of it, that a foundation is laid for the most unreserved invitations, exhortations, and expostulations, and no sinner will be rejected, who sincerely seeks this salvation. Yet these general truths perfectly harmonize with the secret purposes and foreknowledge of God, in respect of the persons, who actually will embrace and obtain the proffered blessings. If then we omit the consideration of the number that perish in the first Adam, or are saved in the second Adam, if we wholly leave this to the wise, righteous, and merciful Creator and Judge of all men, as one of those secret things which belong not to us; and only consider the benefit believers derive from Christ, as compared with the loss sustained in Adam by the human race, we shall then see the passage open most perspicuously and gloriously to our view. For the thought of the supposed vast majority of those, who shall eventually perish, is apt to encumber our minds in such contemplations; I say supposed; for probably we shall find our conjectures erroneous, when the doom of men through all ages and nations shall be finally determined. Let us then advert to the apostle's words. The offence of Adam and its consequences do not in all things coincide with the free gift, or the grace, of redemption. Through that one man's single offence, the many or the multitude, of mankind are dead, under condemnation, and exposed to death temporal and eternal. But the infinite grace and mercy of God, and the free gift of righteousness and salvation, through that one man Jesus Christ, the second Adam, who is also "the "Lord from heaven," much more abound to many, even to all the multitude of believers, by bringing them into a far safer, happier, and more exalted state, than that from which they fell in Adam. For this gift not merely answers to the loss sustained by Adam's sin, but far exceeds it in this respect, that the judgment of God came through Adam's single offence upon mankind, to their condemnation; but the free gift not only delivers believers from that condemnation, but from the punishment due to their own numerous, or rather innumerable, transgressions; nor does it place them anew in a state of probation, like that of Adam before he sinned, but it fixes them in a state of complete justification, even as Adam would have been if he had stood his time of trial. For if, by one offence of one man, death acquired a complete dominion over all the whole human race, so that none were admitted to a personal trial in that respect, whether they would be obedient or not; much more would they, who by faith received the abundance of God's grace and mercy, and were interested in the gift of righteousness, be assuredly preserved in that state of acceptance, and so reign in life, by the perfect obedience of their one Surety Jesus Christ, without the infinite peril, or fatal consequences, of being put upon a personal trial of their obedience, like that in which Adam had failed, and Christ had persevered. Man is indeed in some sense in a probationary state on earth; but no man is put upon the trial, whether he can obtain exemption from the general condemnation of Adam and his seed by his own personal obedience. A trial is made of him, tending to discover the wickedness of his heart by manifold experiments; the trial is made by the Gospel, whether the sinner will repent and believe; professed Christians are tried whether they are sincere or not, and believers are proved in respect of the strength of their faith and grace; yet they are not put upon any probation, with reference to their justification and eternal life, but are accounted righteous, and appointed heirs, by faith alone, through the righteousness of their One divine Surety, which consisted not, like Adam's offence, in one action, but in a continued and perfect conformity to the whole divine law through life, and unto his death upon the cross. Yet, notwithstanding these differences, the similarity is striking and instructive; for, as by the offence of one man sin entered and prevailed to the condemnation of all men; so by the righteousness of One, even Christ, grace entered and prevailed to the complete justification of all men, throughout the earth, and during all ages, who are related to Christ by faith, as all were to Adam by nature. For, as by the disobedience of one single person, being a public character or representative of his posterity, many were made or constituted sinners, and dealt with accordingly, previously to the consideration of their personal transgressions; so by the obedience of One who also was a public character, and the representative of his people, many, even the whole multitude of believers, are constituted righteous before God, and dealt with as such, even previously to the consideration of their personal holiness and obedience, which spring from their spiritual union with Christ, as depravity does from man's natural union with Adam. Thus in many things the type and Antitype coincide, though disobedience and condemnation are opposite to obedience and justification. But the believer, being justified in Christ, has his title to life in him, who preserves it for him, so that he is not left to peradventures, or to the hazards arising from the mutability of creatures, as Adam was; but he is safe by his union with Him, who is "God manifested in the flesh;" and his future felicity will be proportionably more exalted, in consequence of his endeared relation to the Godhead, in Christ his Brother and Friend. As it is evident that all men, in the strict sense of the word, do not "receive "abundance of grace and of the gift of righteousness," or obtain "justification of life;" and that all men, in this universal sense, shall not "reign in life," for some shall "go "away into everlasting punishment," so the term must be explained, in the first clause, of all men in Adam, and in the second, of all men in Christ. (18.)

V. 20, 21. The whole plan, respecting the justification of believers, was fixed and engaged for long before the law was given by Moses. This dispensation entered a little, or among a few persons, compared with the whole posterity of Adam, and for a short time, compared with the duration of the world, but so far from being intended for the justification of sinners, "it entered that the offence "might abound." The moral law, by its perfections, showed that many thoughts, affections, tempers, words, and actions, were sinful, which otherwise would not have been known to be so; it evinced the malignity and desert of every sin, and it irritated man's natural corruption, both to hanker after forbidden objects, and to rise in opposition and enmity against its spiritual precepts and its righteous sanction. Thus it occasioned transgressions to be multiplied, for it had no efficacy to cure human depravity; and at the same time it aggravated the enormity of sin, seeing it was committed against so express a declaration of the divine will. Even the ceremonial law, as considered apart from Christ, multiplied duties, and consequently transgressions. So that the law in every sense entered, in order to show and condemn man's abounding wickedness, as an experiment tried with a specimen of the human race, that the free grace of redemption might be more gloriously displayed, by its super-abounding most where sin had most abounded; and (like the waters of the deluge,) flowing far above the summits of the highest mountains of man's guilt and depravity. So that, as sin, like some terrific victor and tyrant, had reigned with uncontrolled sway, unto the death and ruin of all men, under Adam's covenant; even so grace, or the infinitely free and rich mercy of God, might ascend a more exalted throne, and there reign with benign authority, through the righteousness of the Surety of the new covenant, unto the eternal life of all who believe, in virtue of the power and grace of the Lord Jesus Christ. Grace, as reigning in the believer's heart, may be included; but this is more explicitly treated on in the ensuing chapter; and grace, as reigning upon the throne of God, to justify every believing sinner, and to complete the salvation of every justified believer, is here principally intended.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

A most blessed change takes place in the sinner's state, however vile he has been, when he becomes a true believer; "being justified by faith he hath peace with God," "through our Lord Jesus Christ," which will in due time be communicated to his conscience, and dwell in his heart; he has free access to the mercy-seat, he is established in the grace and favour of God, and he may now rejoice in the hope of everlasting glory, though he just before trembled from apprehensions of deserved vengeance. How vast then are our obligations to him, who hath made "all things ready" by his agonizing death, and hath made our hearts willing by his converting grace! May we act as the covenanted friends of our reconciled God; may we "adorn the doctrine of his salvation;" may we study to recommend it to our fellow-sinners, and to make grateful returns for his love, by our kindness to our poor fellow Christians, who are the brethren and receivers of this our rich and bountiful Benefactor! Then we need not be dismayed by temptations or afflictions, or despond and murmur under them; nay, we may glory and rejoice in them: for though nature feels that tribulation worketh impatience, yet grace finds that at length it produces patience, experience, and a hope, which can never make us ashamed; "because the love of God is shed abroad in "our hearts by the Holy Ghost." This seal of God cannot be broken, and Satan evidently and peculiarly fails in his attempts to counterfeit it; for all false affections, and enthusiastic confidences, are liable to be consumed in the furnace of long-continued afflictions; and they never

CHAP. VI.

Believers are dead to sin, according to the meaning of baptism; which represents their conformity to Christ in his death, burial, resurrection, and living unto God, 1—10. They should reckon themselves to be dead to sin and alive to God, 11; and, as not being under the law, but under grace, they must not suffer sin to reign in their bodies, but yield them to God, as instruments of righteousness, 12—15. Being made free from sin, and become servants to righteousness, they should serve it wholly, 16—20. The service of sin is unfruitful, shameful, and destructive; but the servants of God have their fruit unto holiness, and the end eternal life, 21, 22. This is the gift of God by Christ; but death is the wages of sin, 23.

[a] WHAT shall we say then? [b] Shall we continue in sin, that grace may abound?

can communicate that reciprocal, steady, pre-eminent, and abiding love of God in Christ, which no fire can burn, no waters can quench, and which, in ten thousands of instances has proved stronger than the fear of death, in its most tremendous forms, and has enabled a feeble believer to disregard the cruelties of a savage executioner, in comparison of the anguish of wilfully denying or disobeying his beloved Lord. Surely he is worthy of all this from every one of us! If we consider how helpless, ungodly, rebellious, and full of enmity against God, we were, when his compassionate eye was first fixed upon us, if we reflect on the salvation purposed for us, the price paid for it, the dignity of our Redeemer, the change wrought in us before we would accept of the free gift, and the privileges most graciously bestowed upon us, we cannot but allow, that the love of God our Saviour passeth knowledge, and is infinitely beyond example or illustration. It is inconceivable, that even God himself could more have commended his love to us, or have given us more powerful motives and encouragements to humble submission and grateful obedience. In proportion as we feel the force of these motives, we may be assured that we are justified by the blood of Jesus, and reconciled to God by his death; and that we shall be saved from wrath by him, "who was "dead, and is alive for evermore, and hath the keys of "death and hell." Though conscious of our own sinfulness, we may thus glory in God through Jesus Christ, as having by him received the reconciliation. At the same time we shall learn not to disdain, or despair of, any other sinners; as we shall feel that they are not worse in themselves, or further from God, than we once were, and that they are equally capable of being reconciled in the same way, whatever their character and crimes may heretofore have been.

V. 12—21.

Let us learn habitually to look upon ourselves and the whole human race, as in the ruins of the fall, sinners by nature and practice, exposed to condemnation, and no more able to save our own souls from hell, than to rescue our bodies from the grave. Instead of perplexing ourselves about the deep, but righteous, dispensation of God, in permitting the entrance of sin and death, let us learn to adore his grace for providing so adequate a remedy for that catastrophe, which we are sure consisted with all his glorious perfections. As our children have evidently through us received a sinful, suffering, and dying nature from the first Adam, we should be stirred up, even by their pains and sorrows in helpless infancy, to seek for them the blessings of the second Adam's righteousness and salvation. Though the grace of God and the gift by grace have much more abounded to many through Christ, than justice and wrath did through Adam, yet multitudes choose to remain under the horrid dominion of sin and death, rather than seek the blessings of the reign of grace! But there is the fullest encouragement to every sinner, who comes to Christ for his free and holy salvation, and he will in no wise cast out one such humble supplicant. Let all then flee without delay to this righteousness by faith in Christ, whilst grace fills the throne of God, and before the Judge ascends his dread tribunal; let the entrance of the law into the conscience, that sin may be known to abound, impel the sinner to the greater diligence in applying for free salvation; let none be discouraged by the view of their enormous crimes, seeing there is in Christ much more abounding grace; let the unestablished inquirer give diligence to make sure his interest in the Redeemer, and let the thankful and confirmed believer frequently meditate on his obligations, privileges, security, and prospects. Let him contrast his state in Adam with his felicity in Christ; that whilst he gives all the glory to sovereign grace, through that obedience by which he is made righteous, he may look at all enemies and remaining obstacles, and at the king of terrors, with a victorious hope, assured that "grace shall still reign through righteousness, unto "eternal life, by Jesus Christ our Lord."

NOTES.

CHAP. VI. V. 1, 2. The apostle's doctrine might seem to lie open to the objection, which is now continually made to that of salvation by grace. It might be said, that if we be justified of entire mercy, by the imputation of Christ's righteousness and the efficacy of his sacrifice, through faith alone, without works of any kind or in any degree, either before or after believing, are not men set free from all moral obligation, and the flood-gates of licentiousness thrown open? And if God take occasion, from man's excess in wickedness, the more conspicuously to display his abounding grace, may we not safely, and even on principle, commit more and greater enormities, and continue in sinful practices, without remorse or amendment, on purpose that the riches of divine grace may be the more glorified in our salvation? This sounds specious; and self-deceived hypocrites, through Satan's suggestions, comment in this manner on the Gospel, and so give some colour to the cavils of infidels and Pharisees. But the apostle has taught us how to answer all such objections, and guard against such abuses. He does not set us an example of keeping out of sight, explaining away, or proposing cautiously, the free grace of the Gospel; but while he states his doctrine in the most explicit and decisive language, he shows also the inseparable connexion between justification and sanctification. Let "the thought "be abhorred," says he, "of continuing in sin, that "grace may abound." The unbeliever has no part in that grace, and the believer is "dead to sin," and how then should he live any longer in the practice of it? That view of the glory of God, of the holiness and goodness of the law, and of his own guilt and danger, which, as the effect of regenerating grace, convinced him that he needed the salvation of Christ, and made it precious to his heart, led him also to repent, and to abhor all sin. This change, begun in gracious convictions, was more completely effected, by further discoveries of the grace and experience of the comforts of redemption; so that love and gratitude to the divine Saviour, and other evangelical principles, concur, with hatred of sin, to mortify his affections to its pleasures and interests, and to cause him to separate from iniquity, as a dead man ceases from the actions of life. Not only ought this to be the believer's character, but in a measure it actually is so; thus it forms the proper evidence, being the inseparable concomitant of his justification. This effectually secures him from abusing the doctrines of grace; he may be seduced into sin, but he cannot live any longer in the habitual practice of known transgression; he cannot take occasion, from abounding grace, to continue in sin, that it may still more abound, but on the contrary, in proportion to his admiring views of the riches of God's mercy in his salvation, he will be "steadfast, unmoveable, "and always abounding in the work of the Lord," and he will only be remiss in duty, when such hopes and affections grow languid and low. 'The benefits of justification 'and sanctification are connected by a perpetual bond; 'each of them flows from Christ, by the grace of God. 'Sanctification is the destruction of sin, that is, of our 'original depravity, in the place of which the purity of a 'renewed nature succeeds. This is the quality, which the 'Spirit creates in the members of Christ our Head.— '"Dying unto sin," 'and "living unto God," 'or Christ, or 'righteousness, answer to each other.' (Beza.) It is surprising, that so many learned expositors should interpret the phrase, as if it only meant the outward profession made in baptism; and as if all baptized persons were indeed "dead unto sin!"

V. 3, 4. The apostle, by this question, most emphatically shows, that all who had been baptized into the name and religion of Jesus, had received the sign, and made the profession, of communion with him, and conformity to him, in his death, that in virtue of his dying for their sins, they should die to all sin, and have done with their former unholy satisfactions, pursuits, habits, and connexions. This profession was equivalent to "being "buried with Christ," as dead with him; for as his burial was a manifestation that he was really dead, and an introduction to his immediate resurrection by the glorious power of the Father, or for the display of his glory, so the baptism of a converted Jew, or Gentile, was a professed manifestation of his death to sin, and to all his carnal expectations, affections, and pursuits, from which he meant to be entirely secluded, as one buried is from the affairs of life; and it was a professed introduction to his walking "in newness of life," not only as to his outward actions, but with respect to his inward principles. The spiritual meaning of the external sign is the same, when baptism is administered to the infant-offspring of believers; even as the meaning of circumcision was the same, when it was performed on Abraham the aged believer, on Ishmael who perhaps never believed, and on Isaac an infant of eight days old, long before he believed. It was the outward sign of regeneration, or 'a death unto 'sin, and a new birth unto righteousness,' and it sealed justification by faith to all those who ever possessed the thing signified, but to none else. Thus Simon Magus, though baptized adult, derived no more benefit from the outward sign, than the multitudes do, who, having been baptized in infancy, when grown up, despise the inward and spiritual grace of it. Great stress has been laid upon the expression, "buried with him by baptism into death," as proving that baptism ought to be performed by immersion, to which the apostle is supposed to allude: but we are said also to be crucified with Christ, and circumcised with him, without any allusion to the outward manner in which crucifixion and circumcision were performed; and as baptism is far more frequently mentioned with reference to the pouring out of the Holy Ghost, and as the apostle is evidently treating on the inward meaning, not the outward form, of that ordinance, no conclusive argument seems deducible from the expression, that immersion is necessary to baptism, or that baptism was generally thus administered:

8 Now [u] if we be dead with Christ, [x] we believe that we shall also live with him:

9 Knowing that [y] Christ, being raised from the dead, dieth no more; [z] death hath no more dominion over him.

10 For in that he died, [a] he died unto sin once: but in that he liveth, [b] he liveth unto God.

11 Likewise [c] reckon ye also yourselves to [d] be dead indeed unto sin, [e] but alive unto God [f] through Jesus Christ our Lord.

V. 5—7. 'By an elegant metaphor, the apostle compares Christ, who died and was buried, and rose again from the dead, to a plant, which, being covered in the earth, germinates in due time. And then, because he had said that we are dead to sin, and buried with Christ, that we might rise again unto righteousness, in order to intimate that all these things take place by the grace which we derive from Christ, he says that we have grown together with him into one plant, as those things which are "planted together" 'with a tree grow together, and live by one common sap.' (Beza.) 'We grow together with Christ, as moss,—misseltoe, or such like, grow up by a tree, and are nourished by the juice thereof.' (Leigh.) Sinners become one with Christ, by partaking of the Holy Spirit, which animates his whole mystical body, as the soul does our natural bodies, and by the teaching and influence of the Holy Spirit, they believe unto justification; but the same Spirit also mortifies all their sinful passions, and renews their souls unto holiness. If then a man be planted together with Christ in the likeness of his death, he most certainly will be conformed to him in the likeness of his resurrection, and, by motives and grace derived from him, habitually live a holy life, according to a new rule, and for new ends and purposes. For he will know, that Christ was crucified to atone for sin, in order that he might mortify and destroy it. So that the corrupt nature, (called a man, because it comprises a complete system of unholy dispositions and affections, and imparts its baleful influence through all the powers of the soul and members of the body, and the old man, because derived from the first Adam, and so in every one prior to grace, or the image of the second Adam,) is in all true believers, crucified with Christ, by the grace derived from his cross. It is deprived of dominion, and proscribed as an enemy and a condemned criminal; its destruction is absolutely determined; it is weakened, confined, and in a disgraced, suffering, and dying state, though it yet lives and struggles for life, and even for liberty and victory. Nor is there the least intention, either in the believer or his gracious Lord, to release the crucified rebel; die he must, though in a lingering manner; the whole body of sin, every kind and degree of inconformity to the holy law of God, must be abolished and destroyed, that the believer may no more be the slave of any sin, and that at length he may be finally delivered from its harassing emotions. For he that is dead to the love and practice of sin is freed for ever from its yoke, he hath passed into the service of another master, sin hath no further claim upon him, and shall never recover its lost authority. Thus the seventh verse is commonly explained; but it is most exactly translated: "He that is dead has been justified "from sin;" and the literal meaning seems still more aptly to coincide with the apostle's argument; he, and he only who is dead to sin, is justified from the guilt of it, "having received the free gift unto justification of life," (v. 18.) His death to sin is the requisite attestation of his being accounted righteous, so that the doctrine, properly understood, is incapable of that perversion which is generally objected to it.

V. 8—10. Conformity to Christ, in his death and resurrection, is the experimental ground of hope, that we shall live with Christ for ever in heaven, as partakers of the gift of God, even eternal life, through him. The promise of eternal life is indeed the direct ground of hope in this respect; but all who hear the Gospel do not obtain the blessing, and how shall we know that we, rather than our neighbours, are interested in the promise, except by being conscious of having experienced this 'death unto sin, and new birth unto righteousness?' If a professed Christian is a stranger to this change, his confidence of reigning with Christ in glory is presumptuous. But when we become dead to our once most beloved sinful pleasures, our prospect is clear, and our interest in the righteousness of the Surety is demonstrated. He rose from the dead, no more to be subjected to the dominion of death, seeing the end for which he died was fully answered. He could never have been liable to death, had it not been on account of our sins imputed to him as our Surety, to expiate which he died once; but, having accomplished that grand and gracious design, he rose again, and now in our nature, as one with the Father, he liveth a heavenly life, in unspeakable exaltation and felicity, to the glory of the divine perfections and government, by the conducting and perfecting of his mediatorial work, "as "Head over all things to his church." In like manner, therefore, in conformity to his death and resurrection, we die unto sin, are delivered from its dominion, and rise to a new life, to fall no more under that bondage; but henceforth for ever to live unto God, and to find happiness in his holy service, and in glorifying his name. As the blessed Jesus was in himself wholly free from sin, it seems impossible to find any satisfactory meaning in the words, "He died unto sin once," unless we allow that he died as an atoning sacrifice for the sins of men, which were imputed to him, and "bare them in his own body "on the tree."

V. 11. The preceding verses declare the character and experience of real Christians, according to their measure of grace; but the apostle here proceeds to exhort professed Christians to evince their sincerity by a suitable conduct, and true believers to live up to their privileges, and in consistency with their profession. For this end, let them account themselves to be "dead indeed unto sin," and be influenced by this to a resolute rejection of all its allurements and temptations; and let them consider themselves as alive unto God, through the redemption of his 12 Let [g] not sin therefore reign in your [h] mortal body, that ye should obey it [i] in the lusts thereof:

Son; that they may feel more powerfully the motives of the Gospel, to devote their lives, talents, and powers to his service, and to seek all their happiness in glorifying him.

V. 12, 13. 'The vicious affections, like noxious weeds, sprout up and increase of themselves but too naturally; while the graces of the Christian temper, exotics in the soil of the human heart, like the more tender productions of the vegetable world, though the breath of heaven must quicken them, require on our part also, in order to their being preserved in health and vigour, constant superintendence and assiduous care.' (Wilberforce.) Let none therefore, suffer sin to reign in their bodies, (which were become mortal, and which no attention or gratification could preserve from the grave;) that they should obey and comply with its corrupt lustings, to the injury of their immortal souls. If a professed Christian did this habitually, he could have no evidence of his conversion; as provision is made in the Gospel for deliverance from the dominion, as well as from the condemnation, of sin: and if a real Christian did this in any particular instances, it must weaken his evidence and confidence, and would be the effect of partial unbelief, unwatchfulness, and forgetfulness of his obligations and privileges. Let then no one of them yield, or consign over, the members, senses, or organs of their bodies, to be employed as the instruments or weapons of the carnal propensities of the soul, in doing the work or carrying on the warfare of unrighteousness, in the commission of sin: by making them inlets to sinful thoughts or affections into their hearts; by communicating the inward evil to pollute others with corrupt words; or by gratifying any sensual, malevolent, covetous, or ambitious inclination. But rather let them yield and give up themselves wholly unto God, as alive from the condemnation and death of sin by his abundant grace; that all their powers of body as well as soul, might be consecrated to his service, as instruments of his work in all righteousness, to his glory; or as weapons with which to fight his battles, against sin, the world, and Satan. Thus our eyes should be employed in contemplating the works, and reading the word, of God; our ears, in hearing his voice, and in attending to the cries of the distressed; our tongues in speaking the praises of God, and in profitable conversation; and even our natural inclinations should be so regulated by his law, and subordinated to superior considerations, that whether we eat, or drink, or whatever we do, we may do it to the glory of God. Is it not evident, that sin is here represented as having its seat in the soul, which employs the members of the body as instruments of accomplishing its vile purposes? And if so, what becomes of that system of interpretation, which supposes animal nature to be the flesh, and the rational soul the spirit? (Notes, vii. 15—25. viii. 1—13.)

V. 14, 15. Hope of victory gives fresh ardour to the courageous; assurance of it would make a coward valiant. The slave emancipated from his yoke, or the captive escaped from his dungeon, will resist all attempts to reduce him to his former abject state, with a vigour proportioned to the prospect of preserving his beloved liberty. Thus the apostle assures believers, that sin shall not reassume its hated dominion over them, in order to animate their opposition to its influence in every instance. He shows that the ground of this assurance of final liberty and victory lies in the nature of the covenant. He could not intend merely to distinguish between the legal dispensation and that of the Gospel, for all were not slaves to sin who were under the former, nor are all free from sin who live under the latter. But the moral law, as the foundation of the covenant of works, is evidently opposed to the covenant of grace. All who remain under the legal covenant must be held under the dominion of sin, and their efforts to emancipate themselves must be unsuccessful, because no grace is by it promised, or communicated to a sinner. But the believer passes from under this covenant, to be under that of mercy and grace; and as motives and encouragements are by it supplied, so effectual help is insured to him, to preserve him from ever again becoming the willing slave of any sin, though he may be sorely harassed, baffled, or even polluted, by those temptations and corruptions, to which he once was wholly subjected. May Christians then safely commit sin, because "they are not under the law, but under grace?" To this the apostle answers with his usual energetic expression of abhorrence. A carnal man taking it for granted that he is not under the law, but under grace, because of some change of notions or flow of affections, may thus abuse the doctrine of final perseverance, as well as that of free justification; but the true believer cannot, his heart rises against the vile suggestion, and he must reject it with decided detestation; or if betrayed to yield to it in any instance, he must abhor himself, and deeply repent of such base ingratitude and perverseness.

V. 16—19. It could not but be known and acknowledged, that all believers were the servants of God. The apostle therefore demanded, whether it might not be ascertained whom any man served, by observing the constant tenour of his conduct? A person may do an occasional service for one, to whom he is not a servant; but no doubt he serves that man, to whom he habitually yields and addicts himself, and in whose work he spends his time and strength, day after day, and year after year. The case is the same in spiritual matters; a man may profess Christianity, and in some things appear to serve God, and yet habitually addict himself to sinful pursuits and pleasures. But every one must be judged to be the servant of that master, to execute whose commands he willingly yields himself, whether it be the sinful bias of his own heart, in such actions as lead to death, or the new spiritual disposition to obedience, in habitually performing the righteousness required in the law. The apostle, however, not only congratulated the Romans, but thanked God also, on account of the change which had taken place in them. They had been the willing devoted slaves of sin, which they uniformly obeyed by gratifying their various carnal inclinations, without regard to the authority or glory of God. But they had now cordially obeyed the call of the Gospel, they had been delivered, or cast into the very fashion of it, as melted metal receives and retains the exact impression of the mould into which it is poured. Being thus renewed into the nature of the humble, holy, and loving Gospel of Christ, they were set at liberty from the slavery of sin, and became the servants of righteousness, obeying the dictates of that new nature, which is, as it were, God's representative in the heart, even as sin is that of Satan. These things the apostle stated to the Christians at Rome, by similitudes taken from the affairs of men, "because of the infirmity of their flesh;" which rendered them less capable of understanding abstract reasonings, and that he might guard them against those delusions, to which their weakness and remaining sinfulness would otherwise expose them. As therefore, before their conversion, they had yielded their bodies as well as their souls, to be the servants of uncleanness and injustice, thus continually accumulating guilt, adding strength to their evil propensities, and furthering the cause of wickedness and ungodliness in the world; even so ought they now to devote themselves wholly to be the servants of righteousness, or to execute constantly the commands of God, the dictates of his Spirit, and the motions of the new nature; that by progressive sanctification, they might press forward to perfect holiness, and do what they could to render others also holy and happy.

V. 20. The willing slaves of sin, though by no means free from obligations to be righteous, are yet unrestrained by them in following their own carnal inclinations; they perform no service to righteousness, they are not influenced by a regard to the glory or authority of God in any of their actions, but uniformly gratify some of their own unholy passions, and seek happiness in so doing.

V. 21—23. The apostle here calls on his readers to declare, what advantages they had acquired in the service of sin? What was the fruit produced by those evil actions, of which, as penitents, they were at length ashamed? They could not but know, that vanity, vexation, disappointment, disgrace, disease, remorse, fear, and sorrow, always attended, or followed sinful indulgences, besides their fatal effects on others; and therefore, if this life alone were considered, they could have no rational inducement to return to them. But, besides all present bad consequences, "the end of these things is death," and it is a mere delusion to suppose, that any creed or profession can preserve the habitual transgressor from this condemnation. As death is here opposed to everlasting life, and as temporal death is the end of the most godly, as well as the most ungodly life, it is clearly absurd to restrict his meaning to the death of the body; doubtless he meant the future state of final misery, in a total separation from the presence and favour of God, and under his awful wrath and vengeance. From this condemnation the believer is set at liberty, when made free from sin, as the removal of the malefactor's fetters, and the opening of his dungeon, are connected with the pardon of his crimes. Then the Christian becomes the servant of God, thenceforth he has his fruit unto holiness, or the nature and effects of his conduct are holy, and it tends to increasing sanctification, and also to promote the general cause of truth and holiness against that of delusion, sin, and misery; and it terminates in perfect holiness; so that instead of death, at the end of his course, he is put in possession of everlasting life, of which he had many foretastes, in holy consolations, when serving God in newness of life. But this happy event of his conduct is not to be considered as a merited reward. Indeed death, temporal and eternal, is the stipend, or stipulated and deserved wages, of sin, even of every violation of God's law; this every man hath earned, and every unbeliever will receive. But eternal life is the gift of God to those who condemn themselves, and renounce all dependence on their defective and defiled services, to rely entirely on free grace, through the righteousness and atonement of Jesus Christ; and that holiness, which is the meetness for heavenly happiness, is as much the gift of God through Christ, as that imputed righteousness which is the believer's title to it. Thus the apostle closes his argument concerning justification, and sanctification as the seal and evidence of it.

CHAP. VII.

The believer's death to the law and union with Christ, that he may serve God in newness of spirit, are illustrated by the law concerning marriage, 1—6. Through the depravity of human nature, the law, though holy, just, and good, can only occasion sin and death, 7—13. The painful conflict of those who delight in the law of God, but are not able to keep it, 14—24; and their prospect of deliverance by Christ, 25.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—4.

Self-righteous pride and antinomian licentiousness are two fatal rocks, on which immense multitudes are continually wrecked, and between which none but the Holy Spirit can pilot us; and the objections of open enemies to the doctrines of grace derive their greatest plausibility from the unholy lives of many professed friends. The mercy of God is indeed glorified in proportion to the abounding sin which is freely pardoned to the penitent, but his justice will be glorified in the deepest condemnation of those, who "continue in sin, that grace may abound." Every true believer abhors the thought of thus perverting the Gospel, and despising the riches of divine grace; and could he be led to think that he might go on in sin with impunity, he would be kept back from it, by a strong aversion; for how can he, in whose heart those principles are mortified, which gave rise to his former sinful courses, continue in those practices, which he now has no pleasure in, but loathes and dreads? Our baptism indeed may instruct us in the necessity of thus dying to sin, and being buried, as it were, from all ungodly and unholy pursuits, and of rising to walk with God in newness of life; and unholy professors of Christianity, (alas, how many are they!) belie and virtually renounce their baptism. They have had only the outward sign of 'a death unto sin, and a new birth unto righteousness,' they have never passed from the family of Satan into that of God, they have never renounced the world, the flesh, and the devil, to believe in Christ, and keep his commandments.

V. 5—15

If indeed we have been so made one with Christ, as to stand accepted in his righteousness, we shall certainly have conformity to him in his death and resurrection; and his grace will enable us to "crucify our old man, with his "affections and lusts," and excite us to determine on the destruction of the whole body of sin, that we may no more serve that hated enemy, which crucified our beloved Lord, nor ever rest satisfied, till it hath no place in our souls. Thus, by looking to our crucified, risen and glorified Redeemer, and believing that we shall live together with him, we should be animated to "reckon ourselves "dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God through him." As our mortal bodies will at last be raised immortal and incorruptible by the almighty power of the Saviour, so we should never allow sin to reign in them, or obey it in the lusts thereof; but, praying earnestly for help from above, we should refuse to yield any of our senses or members to be the instruments of unrighteousness, and seek to have them all devoted to God, and employed in his service, as those who have already entered on that divine and happy life, which we hope to lead to all eternity. To this we may be encouraged by the nature of the new covenant. If indeed Christians, we are not under the law, which gives no power, and proposes no mercy, but under the grace of the Gospel; and this ensures to the regenerate the liberty, with which Christ hath made him free.

V. 16—23.

The real Christian finds by experience that his heart as well as his state is changed; he has most cordially changed his master and his work; he remembers that once he was the wretched slave of sin, but he thanks God, that he both heard, understood, believed, and obeyed the Gospel; thus he found his mind cast into the form of it; and as the same metal becomes a new vessel, when melted and cast into the mould, so he became a new creature, when he was thus made free from sin, and became the servant of righteousness. Notwithstanding, therefore, "the infir- "mity of his flesh," he aims, and prays to be enabled, to spend all his powers and capacities of body and soul in the service of righteousness, unto increasing holiness, even as he once yielded them to serve his sinful passions, unto abounding iniquity. As they, who now are the servants of God, once were the slaves of sin, so they, who now are the slaves of sin, may become the servants of God, through the Gospel. We ought therefore diligently to use every means with those who are yet unchanged, in dependence on his blessing to render them effectual; and when the change takes place, we should heartily thank him for it. We may boldly inquire of sinners, What fruit they gather from their vices? What real good they derive from ungodliness and iniquity? We may show them that all must be ashamed of such things, either in deep repentance here, or in everlasting contempt and misery hereafter; for the end of them is death, and every wise man will consider in what future consequences his present conduct is likely to terminate. Happy is he, who is covered with shame for his past offences, who is set at liberty from sin, who has his fruit unto holiness, and the end everlasting life:

[a] KNOW ye not, [b] brethren, (for I speak [c] to them that know the law,) how that [d] the law hath dominion over a man as long as he liveth?

2 For [e] the woman which hath an husband, is bound by the law to her husband so long as he liveth; but if the husband be dead, she is loosed from the law of her husband.

3 So then, [f] if while her husband liveth she be married to another man, she shall be called an adulteress: but if her husband be dead, she is free from that law: so that she is no adulteress, [g] though she be married to another man.

4 Wherefore, my brethren, [h] ye also are become dead to the law by [i] the body of Christ; [k] that ye should be married to another, even to him who is raised from the dead; [l] that ye should bring forth fruit unto God.

It is of the Lord's mercy, that we have not received as well as deserved, the wages of sin; but thanks be to God for the inestimable gift of his own Son to be our Salvation, and of eternal life through him! May we all forego our boasts and renounce our vain confidences, may we come as condemned criminals, not to buy, merit, or earn, the favour of God, which is life eternal, but to supplicate him, for Christ's sake, to bestow it on us as a free gift, that he may have all the glory both now and for evermore!

NOTES.

CHAP. VII. V. 1—4. The apostle had before said, "Sin shall not have dominion over you, for ye are not "under the law, but under grace." (Note, vi. 14, 15.) and he here proceeds to confirm and illustrate that proposition. In interpreting these verses, the meaning of the word law must be first carefully settled, that is, whether the ceremonial law in particular, or the Mosaic dispensation in general, or the moral law, as requiring perfect obedience in order to justification of life, be intended. Most expositors explain it either of the ceremonial law, or the Mosaic dispensation, but they do not assign any satisfactory reason, why sin must have had dominion over a man, as long as he continued under the ceremonial law, or the Mosaic dispensation, or why deliverance from the law in this sense, by professing the Gospel, should ensure his liberty from that slavery. No doubt, great numbers under the Mosaic dispensation were both justified and sanctified (by the mercy and grace of the new covenant indeed;) but their relation to the law did not prevent them from being made free from sin. On the other hand, vast numbers remain slaves to sin under the Christian dispensation, and their external privileges and profession do not deliver them. But so long as a man continues under the law, as a covenant, and seeks justification by his own obedience, he inevitably continues the slave of sin, in one form or other, as nothing but "the Spirit of life in "Christ Jesus" can make any one "free from the law "of sin and death;" and on the other hand, every one who is delivered from the law, as a covenant, by living faith in Christ, is, by the "Spirit of life" given to him, delivered from the bondage of sin, which shall never more have dominion over him. The apostle's argument through the rest of this chapter relates exclusively to the moral law, and refers especially to the tenth commandment, as they who explain these verses of the ceremonial law, or the Mosaic dispensation, are constrained to admit; and though he speaks in the first three verses of the law in a more general sense, it should be noticed, that he is only illustrating his main subject by an apt similitude. 'When 'the apostle particularly meant the ceremonial, in distinc'tion from the moral, law, he frequently spoke of it in 'diminutive terms. (Eph. ii. 15. Col. ii. 20. Heb. viii. '13. ix. 10.) But none of these lessening or distinctive 'characters of the law are found in this epistle, to 'restrain it to the ceremonial law, in what is said about 'justification by its works.' (Guise.) These remarks may prepare the way for that interpretation of this passage, and of the chapter, which, after mature deliberation, I have given. Many Jewish converts to Christianity resided at Rome, and the apostle, it is probable, more immediately intended these, when he said, "I speak "unto you that know the law." But several of the Gentile converts had doubtless got acquainted with the books of Moses. Now it was well known by them, that the law retained its authority over a man, to enforce obedience or inflict punishment, as long as he lived, (or as it lived, as the clause may be rendered.) In ordinary cases death alone dissolved the relation between the Jew and the law, yet, in particular instances, the law became dead, and lost its authority to command or condemn a man, through his change of circumstance; and when the Jew became a Christian, and understood his Christian liberty, his relation to the legal dispensation was finally terminated. From this case of a Jew, in respect of the law of Moses, as the condition of the national covenant, they might learn how the matter stood in respect of the moral law, as the condition of the covenant of works. The law respecting marriage also, would aptly illustrate the subject. The married woman was bound to her husband in the strictest bonds, and while the moral law forbad adultery, the judicial law condemned the adulteress to death; but this law became dead to her, and she to it, by the death of her husband. If, before this, she had been married to another man, the law would have condemned her to be stoned; but after her husband's death, she incurred no penalty by marrying another man. The apostle does not, in this place, state the precepts concerning marriage under the Christian dispensation; he merely shows, in one particular, how the case stood under the law; he says nothing concerning divorces or polygamy, neither does he intimate that the man would be an adulterer, who took another wife, while his former was living and not legally divorced; yet our Lord hath taught this. (Notes, Matt. xix. 1—9.) It would therefore be foreign to the apostle's design to interpret his words as meaning, that a woman, who had been equitably divorced for consanguinity, (which rendered her former marriage a nullity;) or for any other cause, would be guilty of adultery, if she married again during her former husband's life: for neither the law of Moses, nor the precepts of Christ, inculcate any such thing. Now the case of the believer, in respect of the subject under consideration, bore some analogy to that which had been stated. Not only were the Jewish converts dead to the Mosaic law, by its virtual abrogation; but all true Christians were become dead to the moral law, as a covenant of works "by the body of Christ," by his incarnation, obedience, and sacrifice on the cross for their transgressions. He having thus answered its demands as their Surety, it had no further power to condemn; but believers were looked upon to have fully endured its sentence, and fulfilled its righteousness, by their Representative. Thus the relation between them and the law was dissolved, (as marriage is by the natural or legal death of either party;) and this was in order to their being married to Christ as risen from the dead, that being united to him according to the covenant of grace, and interested in all his unsearchable riches, they might, by the supply of his Spirit, bring forth such fruit in their lives, as should bear the holy stamp of God upon it; be meet for his gracious acceptance; and honourable to his name. It should be remembered, that many of the Christians at Rome had been Gentiles, who never were under the Mosaic law; and even the Jewish converts were not as yet required to renounce it: and this consideration still more fully proves that the apostle meant something very different from what many learned expositors have supposed. (Note, Gal. ii. 19, 20.)

V. 5, 6. "In the flesh," evidently means an unregenerate state, (Marg. Ref.) which is the necessary consequence of being under the covenant of works, and destitute of the grace of the Gospel. While, therefore, both Jews and Gentiles were in this state, the motions of sin, or those carnal desires and affections which the law forbad, powerfully exerted themselves, wrought by the members of the body, or rather in all the constituent parts of the man, to produce such thoughts, desires, words, and works, as subjected them to death by the sentence of the law, instead of entitling them to life, as having fulfilled its righteousness. But when, by faith in Christ, they were delivered from that covenant, and their former relation to the law was dissolved, they becoming dead to it, or it becoming dead to them, they were brought into a new relation to Christ, and God dealt with them by another covenant. Being, therefore, now regenerate, and having sure promises of grace as well as mercy, they were encouraged and enabled to worship and obey God in newness of spirit, from ingenuous principles, according to the spiritual meaning of the precept, in cordial love and gratitude, under the influence of the Holy Spirit, and not merely with external observances, moral or ceremonial, according to the mere letter of the precept, and the corrupt glosses of the scribes and elders upon it, of which alone the old nature is capable. (Notes, &c. Matt. v. 2 Cor. iii.) 'Some 'of the works of the flesh do not require the members of 'our body, but only the faculties of our minds, for their 'performance.' (Locke.)

V. 7, 8. It might be objected, that if they who were under the law inevitably remained the slaves of sin, and if none could serve God in newness of spirit, till they were dead to it, and it to them, surely the law and sin were in substance the same, and would not this be a vile aspersion to cast upon the law of God? To this objection, the apostle answered, with abhorrence of such blasphemy, by observing that the law and sin were diametrically opposite to each other, and that the former tended to discover and detect the latter, (iii. 20. v. 20.) so that, in his own case, he should not have known the sinfulness of his affections and actions, but by the law. That exact balance detected the deficiency of his obedience, and that perfect standard showed the obliquity of his heart and life, as well as proved his sins to be more aggravated and numerous, than he had ever before imagined; at the same time that it contained no provision of mercy or grace for him. Thus the wholesome laws of the community shut up the criminal in a dungeon, load him with fetters, and condemn him to death for his contrariety to them; but the clemency of the prince alone can give him a pardon and release. In particular, the apostle observes, that, by his natural conscience without the law, he should not have known that lust, or coveting, was sinful; he should not have supposed, that, though free from adultery, theft, or murder, yet the desire of a forbidden indulgence, or an object withheld by Providence, was criminal, even so criminal as to expose him to the curse of the law. Nay, he should not have felt so many lustings or covetings, if the very strictness of the commandment, "Thou shalt not "covet," had not given occasion to them. So that sin, (his depraved nature, spoken of as an agent,) traiterously watching the opportunity of destroying him, took occasion from the commandment to excite in his heart all manner of concupiscence. The imagination began to rove after forbidden objects, the carnal heart hankered for them, and he was led to conceive of some greater satisfaction in them, than in those which were not forbidden. That man has no deep knowledge of human nature, or the perverse wickedness of his own heart, who does not observe, or is not conscious, of this irrational propensity, to fancy that there is something exquisitely pleasurable in what is out of our reach, or prohibited. Indeed, it seems natural to expect that it would be so with the posterity of those, who could be satisfied with no fruit in the garden of God, except that which he had forbidden; amidst the profusion of Eden, perhaps that tree had been disregarded, if it had not been prohibited. We soon see this propensity in others, especially in our children, though perhaps self-love may make us blind to it in ourselves. "For without "the law sin was dead;" not only the same affections and actions could not have hurt us, if the law had not given sin its condemning power, but the sinful principle lays comparatively in a dead or dormant state, as a frozen serpent is inactive and innoxious, till the warmth enlivens it, and it recovers vigour, and then if provoked its nature becomes apparent. Thus the spiritual precepts and awful sanctions of the law excite the depravity of the heart by their contrariety to it, (as the alkali produces an effervescence by its opposition to the acid;) and so the heart rises in blasphemous enmity to the law, and rushes more impetuously into transgression. In what sense can this be applied to the ceremonial law, the ordinances of which a carnal mind might readily comply with, provided their relation to the Gospel were not perceived? Does the tenth commandment belong to the ceremonial law? Where is the marked transition from the ceremonial to the moral law to be found in this discussion? Is not the apostle evidently throughout illustrating one proposition, namely, that they who are under the law are slaves to sin? The inconsistency of expositors, who set out by confining the meaning to the ceremonial law, or the Mosaic dispensation, and then glide, either imperceptibly to themselves, or at least without hinting it to their readers, to the most spiritual precept of the moral law, must be obvious to every attentive student; and the perplexity which arises from this source is inexpressible. 'It is surprising to me, 'that the learned Mr. Locke, and some others after him, 'should make the sense of the passage to be, "without "the law," (meaning the law given by Moses) "sin is "dead," not able to hurt me, or, without the law of 'Moses, which annexes death to transgression, sin is as 'good as dead, is not able to have its will against me, and 'bring death upon me. For this is contrary to the 'apostle's peremptory assertions, that "by one man sin "entered into the world and death by sin," "that sin "was in the world until," or all along before, "the "law," and that "death reigned from Adam to Moses." '(v. 12–14.) How then could it be said, that sin was 'not able to hurt the apostle, or to bring death on him, 'or upon any other Jew, without the law of Moses; 'since "it had reigned unto death," so many hundred 'years before that law was given; and we are told, that 'the very heathens, who had only the law of nature, 'knew the judgment of God, that the transgressors of 'that law were worthy of death?' (Rom. i. 32.) (Guise.)

V. 9–12. It seems evident, that the apostle here spoke literally of himself and his own experience. If he personated another man, why did he not give some intimation of his design? In another place he fairly brought forward the Jew, (ii. 17–29.) and ambiguity is no characteristic of his writings. Indeed, I apprehend, that the more humble and spiritual any Christian is, the more clearly will he perceive, that the apostle describes the experience of the true believer, from his first convictions to his greatest progress in grace during this present life. His avowed object is to show that the law can do nothing for a sinner, either to justify or sanctify him, and that the believer feels this daily, as long as he lives. "I was," says he, "alive without the law once;" he was once a Pharisee, ignorant of the spirituality of the law, and only attentive to the outward letter, to the corrupt glosses of the scribes, which served only to limit and explain away even the literal sense of the command, and to ceremonies and traditions; and having some general decency of character, without any acquaintance with his inward corruptions, he concluded that his heart and life were good, and that he was in a state of acceptance with God. But when the commandment came to his conscience, by the convictions of the Holy Spirit, and he perceived its righteous and extensive requirements, and its severe denunciations, he found the lusts of his heart, which before seemed dormant, rise against it, and every endeavour to fulfil its precepts showed him more plainly his inability to do it. Thus his former hopes died away, he found himself a helpless sinner under merited condemnation, and became as a dead man, except as the Gospel revived him from despondency. And the law, of which the promise was, that "The man that doeth these things shall live in them," which was originally ordained to life for holy creatures, and from which he, though a sinner, had expected heaven, was "found to be unto death;" even as the law of the land, which secures the lives of honest men, is found to be unto death by the murderer or robber. The ceremonial law was not ordained unto life, except as it pointed out Christ, the Substance of its shadows, and it was found unto death by none, but those who made it an appendix to the covenant of works, and rejected Christ for the sake of it; and this perfectly coincides with the interpretation above given. For sin, the corruption of fallen nature, being averse to the holy strictness of the law, by its extreme deceitfulness, seduced Paul into various transgressions, and thus slew all his self-righteous hopes, and actually brought him under deeper condemnation. Not that the law caused this, or even gave any just occasion for it: though sin took occasion from it, as a wicked man takes occasion from a pious discourse, or a friendly admonition, to scoff, blaspheme, or rage the more. The whole law must therefore be allowed to be perfectly holy, the transcript of the divine character; and each commandment, (especially that prohibiting concupiscence,) most pure, and at the utmost distance from moral evil; most just, as requiring nothing more than what is righteously due to God and our neighbours; and most good, as tending to the true welfare of ourselves, our families, the community, and all mankind: so that the universal observance of it would almost annihilate the evils of the world, and convert earth into heaven. The apostle never passes such eulogiums on the ceremonial law, or the Mosaic dispensation: they had a temporary fitness and goodness; but they made nothing perfect, and consisted of carnal ordinances, which continued in force till the time of reformation.

V. 13, 14. The question here recurred, Was a good law made death to those who were under it? Was this its natural tendency and efficacy? This conclusion the apostle rejects with detestation. Wholesome food, or a valuable medicine, through a diseased state of the body, or when taken improperly, may occasion death, contrary to its general and proper tendency: but poison kills, as a cause by its native efficacy. The law may occasion death through man's depravity; but sin is the poison that causes it. It was not therefore the law, but sin, that was made death to Paul: sin took occasion from the goodness of the law to manifest its own deformity, odiousness, and dire malignity, by working death in him by that which was good, as an intemperate man murders himself, not by a sword or by poison, but by the wholesome gifts of a bountiful Providence. Thus through the commandment "sin became exceeding sinful;" that is, the odious and ruinous nature of sin, as well as the sinfulness of the human heart, were most clearly shown, in order that the abounding grace of God might appear the more glorious. For, says the apostle, we "know and allow that the law is "spiritual." It is not like human laws, which only reach to the outward actions, and take no cognizance of the motives, affections, and thoughts: for God chiefly respects these: the law requires an entire conformity to the spiritual excellency of the divine perfections, and such a state of the heart as approves itself to him who is a Spirit; and it allows of nothing but what is done from the most pure and sublime motives, and in perfect love, zeal, gratitude, and delight. Compared with this, the apostle found that he was "carnal, sold under sin:" his nature was perfectly opposite to this spiritual law; and after all his attainments in grace, he found himself so much short of this perfection, and in every respect so unable to attain to it, though he ardently aspired after it; that he seemed comparatively to be carnal, and like a man who is sold against his will to a hated master, from whom he can by no means set himself at liberty. Numbers cannot conceive, that St. Paul could mean this of himself as a confirmed believer; and finding it to be inseparably connected with what follows, they would explain the whole of an awakened Jew, or some other convinced sinner, who is seeking justification by the works of the law; or at most of an unconfirmed believer. But such things are spoken as are true of none but real Christians; and the whole is actually verified in their experience. A believer cannot willingly sell himself to work wickedness, as Ahab did; nor will he imitate those slaves, who loved their master and his service, and refused liberty when offered to them: yet when he compares his actual attainments with the spirituality of the law, and with his own desire and aim to obey it, he sees that he is yet to a great degree carnal in the state of his mind, and under the power of evil propensities, from which, (like a man sold for a slave,) he cannot wholly emancipate himself. He is carnal in exact proportion to the degree in which he falls short of perfect conformity to the law of God: and he indignantly and reluctantly serves an abhorred master; yet cannot shake off the galling chain, till his powerful and gracious Friend comes to rescue him from it. It is true, this inability lies only in the remaining evil of his heart: yet it is a real, but most humiliating, hinderance to his serving God, as angels and the spirits of just men made perfect do, or as the Saviour did, who could say, "The prince of "this world cometh, and hath nothing in me." To this perfect holiness the zealous believer cannot but aspire, nothing short of it will ever satisfy his "hungering and "thirsting after righteousness," and this proves that in another sense he is made free from sin, and become the "servant of righteousness." As the apostle was far more enlightened and humble than Christians in general are, so doubtless this clog was more uneasy to him, than it is to them, (though some of us find our lives at times embittered by it.) So that this energetic language, which many imagine to describe an unestablished believer's experience, or even that of an unconverted person, seems to have resulted from the extraordinary degree of St. Paul's sanctification, and the depth of his self-abasement and hatred of sin; and the reason of our not readily understanding him seems to be, because we are so far beneath him in holiness, humility, acquaintance with the spirituality of God's law, and the evil of our own hearts. In the former part of the chapter, the apostle had spoken in the past tense, "I was "alive, &c;" but here he uses the present, to which he uniformly adheres in what follows. He had described his state as a blind proud Pharisee, and the manner in which he became dead to the law, as to dependence on it for justification; and here he shows, that even as a confirmed Christian, all his hope and all his holiness must come from Christ, according to the new covenant. Thus, in another place, he says, "What things were gain to me, these I "counted loss for Christ, yea, doubtless, and I count all 15 For [t] that which I do, I * allow not; for [u] what I would, that do I not; but [x] what I hate, that do I.

16 If then I do that which I would not, [y] I consent unto the law that it is good.

17 Now then, [z] it is no more I that do it, but [a] sin that dwelleth in me.

18 For I know [b] that in me, (that is, [c] in my flesh,) dwelleth no good thing: [d] for to will is present with me, but how to perform that which is good, I find not.

19 For the good that I would, I do not: but the evil which I would not, that I do.

"things but loss, for the excellency of the knowledge of "Christ Jesus, &c." (Note, Phil. iii. 7—9.) Some indeed make the transition from the experience of the apostle, under his first convictions, to his subsequent conflict with indwelling sin, to be made at the next verse; but the change of tense in this place hardly admits of that construction. In the very same chapter, in which our Lord pronounces Peter blessed, as a believer, he says, "Thou savourest not the things that be of God, but those "that be of men," (Matt. xvi. 23.) that is, thou art carnal, not totally, but in a considerable degree. Humbly to confess and deeply to lament being thus "carnal and "sold under sin," is not the disposition and conduct of a willing slave to his lusts; and the readiness, with which numbers of the most eminent believers adopt the apostle's language, shows that it is very suitable to their strong feelings of self-abasement and abhorrence of sin. "I ab-"hor myself, and repent in dust and ashes." "Wo is me? "for I am undone, for I am a man of unclean lips, &c." "My soul cleaveth unto the dust." "Surely I am more "brutish than any man!"

V. 15—17. The apostle here more particularly enlarges on the conflict, which he daily maintained with the remainder of his natural depravity. He was frequently betrayed into such tempers, words, or actions, as he did not approve, or allow, in his renewed judgment and affections. He earnestly desired, and fully determined, if possible, to perform a perfect obedience to the law of God, but he continually fell short; and while he hated and abhorred every kind and degree of sin, he found it impracticable wholly to avoid committing it. In thus doing what he hated, and desired above all things to shun, he "consented to the law, that it was good;" and as the prevailing bias of his soul was to holiness, he was evidenced by it to be a regenerate man, under the covenant of grace, so that it would not be considered that he did the evil which he hated, but it would be charged to the account of sin, that dwelt in him as a detested inmate, which he could not expel, though he would not willingly obey it. He certainly did not mean to excuse his sinfulness, as if he might not justly have been condemned for it; but to show that righteousness could in no case be by the law, and that, by the grace of the Gospel, a man's state and character are determined according to what habitually prevails in his heart and life, notwithstanding impediments and restraints. A wicked man feels some inward opposition to his crimes from conscience, fear, or shame, and he meets with various obstacles to the gratification of his desires, yet all this is accounted for nothing, whilst sin habitually prevails in his heart and conduct; and a godly man has great hinderances in his holy progress, from indwelling sin and outward temptation, yet this is not imputed to him for condemnation, seeing the prevailing state of his heart and tenour of his conduct are holy. Thus Judas, in betraying Christ, acted in character, according to the habitual, though concealed, state of his heart; it was he that did it: but Peter, through sudden temptation, acted out of character, and contrary to the habitual state of his heart, in denying Christ; it was "not "he, but sin that dwelt in him," according to the gracious tenour of the new covenant.

V. 18—21. The apostle knew, that in him, as a fallen creature, apart from regenerating grace, no good thing, but sin, and only sin, was found, though its actings were more specious at one time than another. It is evident from the limitation, "that is, in my flesh," that he spoke as a believer, who had grace as well as sin dwelling in him; for it will soon appear, that by flesh, in this connexion, he does not mean the body as distinct from the soul, but the old man, or human nature, in unregeneracy, which never concurs with the Holy Spirit in regeneration, or with the new man afterwards, but strives against both. He was more deeply acquainted with this humiliating truth by his experience subsequent to conversion, than he had been before. Formerly, he might have supposed that a little good disposition, or moral ability to holiness, was in man, but this was now experimentally disproved. As regenerate, he had indeed an habitual willingness to obey the law of God, and to accomplish the good required by it; but his corrupt nature, though dethroned and crucified, made such constant opposition to this, that he could by no means perform what he aimed at. So that, in fact, he did not fulfil that measure of good, which he was habitually desirous of doing, but in every thing fell short of his aim; and he was also frequently doing the evil, in some measure or respect, which he was most bent upon avoiding. Now, as he was thus constantly baffled and obstructed, in his earnest persevering desires and endeavours to obey the law, it was evident that it was not properly he, as a believer, who did this, but the traitor and enemy that lodged within his heart. He was obliged, contrary to his habitually prevalent inclinations, to live under a sort of necessity of being a sinner, and he could only persist in maintaining the conflict with his inward enemies, without being able entirely to extirpate them. For, in fact, he found, by painful experience, that there was a law imposed upon him, in his present state of warfare, that when he was most desirous of doing good, evil was present with him, to interrupt, intrude, baffle, discourage, and defile him. Let any man who knows his own heart, and the spirituality of the law of God, compare his actual conduct, comprising his thoughts, affections, words, and works, during any given time, with his purposes, prevailing desires, and earnest persevering prayers; let him take that one duty which he especially aims to perform most perfectly, or that temper or evil propensity which he most longs to rectify or extinguish; let him examine himself very exactly in these respects every night, and he will surely find, that he cannot but be a sinner still, and is subjected to "a law, "that when he would do good, evil is present with him." God has wise reasons for permitting this to be so, especially to give us a deeper sense of the malignity of sin and our own vileness, in order to commend the grace of the Gospel; but they, who are most acquainted with the excellency of the law, and most diligently aim in every thing to obey it, will be most sensible that the case is really thus with them. Yet this opposition to sin, and mortifying disappointment respecting their most ardent desires, must not be confounded with the willing slavery of sin, and the convenient excuse of indwelling depravity. The apostle, "daily exercised himself to have a conscience "void of offence toward God and man;" and could call others to witness, "how holily, and justly, and unblame-"ably, he had behaved among them." Yet this was not inconsistent with his being deeply humbled in the sight of God, by the consciousness of wandering thoughts in prayer, want of fervour of love and gratitude to God, zeal for his glory, and enlarged good will to men, the rising of evil tempers, the intrusion of vain imaginations, and the intermixture of selfish motives. All these are sin, and as such, hated and abhorred, in proportion to the degree of sanctification; yet no mere man on earth, after all possible diligence, watchfulness, fasting, and prayer, could truly say, that in these respects he was perfectly free from sin, in his worship and obedience. So that even a person, who is not conscious of at any time neglecting one duty, or committing one actual transgression in word or deed, (which is at least a most uncommon case,) yet aspiring to be holy as an angel, or as Jesus Christ was, will very painfully feel, that "he doeth not the things that he would, "and find a law, that when he would do good, evil is "present with him;" and the more spiritual the services are, in which he engages, the greater clog and hinderance will it be to him. Had the apostle intended to describe the case of any of those, however distinguished, who habitually live in sin, against the conviction of their own judgment and conscience, it cannot be conceived, that he would not, with his usual concise energy, have reprobated their conduct, as far more aggravated than that of ignorant and thoughtless transgressors; but nothing of this kind appears; on the contrary, he leads on the character, which he is describing, to exultation and joy in believing.

V. 22—25. By the "inward man," the apostle must mean the soul, as renewed by divine grace. He alone uses the term, and concerning believers only. The affections and powers of the soul of fallen man are more opposite to the law of God, than the bodily appetites; nay, the latter are not sinful, except as improperly gratified through the lusts of the heart. (Marg. Ref.) But to approve, and even delight in, the law of God, according to the habitual judgment and affections of the soul, through a kind of spiritual sympathy, or congeniality of heart with its most spiritual requirements, must be peculiar to the regenerate, and imply a high degree of sanctification. (Note, viii. 5—9.) This the apostle had attained to; yet he found another law in his members, (not the members of his body, but the constituent parts of the old man,) which continually enjoined a conduct, or suggested inclinations, contrary to "the law of his mind;" and this tended to bring him into captivity to the law of sin, and in some cases for a time it produced that effect. This painful conflict was more grievous to him than all his other trials; so that he was led to bemoan himself as a wretched man, who was constrained by invincible necessity to be, and to do, what he most abhorred. This extorted a bitter complaint, which neither bonds, nor stripes, nor tortures, could have done; and with a sort of holy impatience and eagerness, he exclaimed, "O wretched man that I am! "who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" For indwelling sin clogged his motions, offended his senses, and was a nuisance to him, as a spiritual man; even as if any one should be forced to drag about with him a putrifying corpse, as by a refinement of cruelty some have been sentenced to do. He found by experience that he could not deliver himself; and the law, instead of delivering him, seemed to make the case still worse; but this made him the more fervently to thank God, for the method of salvation revealed through Jesus Christ, which gave him earnest and sure hopes of final and complete deliverance from this enemy, and a triumphant victory in this spiritual warfare. "So then," says he, "I myself with "my mind," my prevailing judgment, affections, and purposes, as a regenerate man, "serve and obey the law of "God;" but with the flesh, the carnal nature, the remains of depravity, "I serve the law of sin," or that law which wars against the law of my mind. conversion the whole man serves this law, with a very feeble opposition from conscience, fear, and shame; but at length the usurper is dethroned, and grace reigns in the heart. Yet still the usurper lurks in the kingdom, reigns over his own party, makes war, creates immense disturbance, and gains temporary advantages, but he is hated, opposed, proscribed, and shall die. Delight in the law of God. 'This is so sure a trace of real piety, and is represented in Scripture as in this view so decisive, that if it be supposed a true representation of a character, we must surely allow it to have been that of a truly good man.' (Doddridge.) It is especially spoken of Christ, and of the man after God's own heart, as the type of him. It is the effect of "the law being written in the heart," and it is the direct opposite of "the carnal mind, which is enmity against God, for it is not subject to the law of God, nor indeed can be." (Marg. Ref.) "Consenting to the law that it is good," delighting in the holy, just, good, and spiritual law of God, hating all evil, loving all good, and being deeply distressed at not being able to do the good that is loved, are all exclusively peculiar to the regenerate, and widely different from a heathen saying in one particular; 'I see and approve the better, but follow the worse,' which in fact any man might say. Many of the professions and petitions of David in the hundred and nineteenth Psalm, as well as in other places, are of a similar nature. (Marg. Ref.) Indeed, such a conflict as is here described, must exist, where sin is hated, and the law of God delighted in, till holiness is perfected; and as abhorrence of evil must increase in proportion to the love of God and holiness, so the least degree of evil rising in the heart, and escaping from the lips, in some passionate or vain word, will necessarily more grieve and burden an eminent saint, than perhaps the grossest crimes did, before his conversion; even as a speck of dirt gives more uneasiness to a very cleanly person, than the most squalid filthiness does to those, who are used to live in it as their element. There is, therefore, no manner of need to have recourse to such unnatural expedients in expounding this chapter, as to imagine, that when the apostle said, "I myself," he meant some other person of a widely different character, or the whole family of Abraham, before and under the law. However these theories have been sanctioned by eminent names, they go upon suppositions for which the Scripture gives not the least ground, which are absurd in themselves, and which are wholly unprecedented and unparalleled in the writings of any good author, sacred or profane. No doubt, numbers have perverted the words of the apostle; and it is fairly allowed, that no man, who is not himself engaged in this conflict, can clearly understand his meaning, or fully enter into those feelings, which dicated his energetic language. But as to the former case, they who want an excuse for sin, "wrest the other Scriptures also to their own destruction;" and as to the latter, "The secret of the LORD is with them that fear him," and "The heart knoweth his own bitterness, and a stranger doth not intermeddle with his joy." It cannot be supposed, that a man who never saw war could enter into the feelings, and fully understand the ardent language, of an experienced soldier, when he related all his conflicts, dangers, hardships, terrors, narrow escapes, victories and triumphs. But I apprehend that many pious persons exclude themselves from the rich source of instruction and consolation in their warfare, provided for them in this chapter, either from fear lest others should pervert it to bad purposes, or because men of great name have affected to reprobate the obvious interpretation, and have tried to force some other meaning upon the words.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

We stand in such a relation to the holy law of God, as the rule of our present conduct and future judgment, that none but he, who formed the union, can dissolve it, and unless "we become dead to the law by the body of Christ," renouncing all expectations from it, that we may be united to Him, who died for our sins and rose again for our justification, we must abide under the dominion and curse of the law for ever. If, however, we are thus delivered, it is not in order to our being lawless, but that the Spirit of Christ dwelling in us may write the law in our hearts, and enable us to bring forth the fruits of holy obedience, to the glory of God. Indeed this is absolutely necessary, in order to our serving God with that newness of spirit, which the law itself demands, for sanctifying grace comes only by the new covenant, without which we must continue in the flesh, and our natural concupiscence will work against the law to bring forth fruit unto death; and nothing but a formal obedience to the outward letter of any precept can thus be performed.

V. 7—13.

It is no fault of the law that it cannot justify or sanctify a sinner; nay, it is the necessary effect of its perfection, by which it detects and condemns the least degree of evil, and leaves the transgressor to merited ruin, without help or remedy; and the better the law is, the more righteous is the doom of those who break it. We should therefore be very careful, in showing the impossibility of salvation by the law, to avoid all expressions that so much as seem derogatory to it. On the contrary, we should bear decided testimony to its righteousness, spirituality, and excellency, and show that it is, on that very account, only suited to manifestation of the children of God, 19—22; who "groan being burdened," are saved in hope, and patiently expect deliverance, 23—25; the Holy Spirit aiding their prayers, and thus rendering them acceptable, 26, 27. All things work together for their good, 28; this springs from their predestination to life, and is secured by the death, resurrection, and intercession of Christ, 29—34. Nothing shall separate them from the love of God through Christ, 35—39.

show the sinner the danger of his case, and to render it still worse, so long as he foolishly cleaves to it, and depends on it. For no man could expect to be either justified or sanctified by a broken law, or according to a forfeited covenant, were he not ignorant of the law, and of himself as compared with it; so that the proudest Pharisee on earth would, from his towering height of vain confidence, sink into despair, if the commandments were at once discovered to his soul in all their spirituality and excellency, without a correspondent view of the salvation of Christ. Ten thousand unobserved transgressions would stand in array against him, his former foibles and infirmities would appear desperate rebellion, ingratitude, and enmity, his admired duties would appear loathsome through pride, selfishness and hypocrisy, and the dormant lusts of his heart, which secular motives or carnal hopes had restrained, would break forth into enmity against God, disdain subjection to his law, work in him all manner of concupiscence, and concur in slaying his hope and his soul. Thus the law, which was "ordained unto "life," would be found to be unto death, through the deceitfulness of sin, and the unsuspected and desperate wickedness of his heart, working death in him by that which was good, and making manifest its exceeding sinfulness. So that a proper knowledge of the holy law of God is the two edged sword, that gives the death wound both to self-righteousness and to antinomianism; for it is perfectly fit to be the rule of our duty, to be written in our hearts, and obeyed in our lives, for the very same reasons, on account of which it cannot justify or save us.

V. 14—25.

The believer knows something of the subject here spoken of by the apostle, when he first flees for refuge to the hope of the Gospel; but his subsequent experience gives him still further insight into it. He is now in a measure spiritual, yet in comparison with the spiritual requirements of the law, and the best desires of his heart, he must confess that he "is carnal and sold under sin," and he groans under that clog and those fetters, which, as it were, chain him to the earth, and prevent him from mounting heaven-ward, as he longs to do. "He consents "to the law that it is good," yea, "he delights in it," he would do the good it requires, he allows of no violation of it, he wants no change in it, but longs to have his heart brought into a perfect conformity to it; he abhors all sin, and would serve God as angels do; he watches, prays, strives, and uses every means for this purpose; yet after persevering in this course for many years, he finds that he cannot attain to perfection. Still he sins against his own allowance; he does what he hates, and longs to be preserved from; his will often changes, like the weather-cock, with the wind, that which on his knees he most ardently prayed against, and dreaded more than pain or death, he is betrayed into in the hour of temptation; his resolutions melt like the firm ice before the noon-day sun, and he is counteracted in obeying the dictates of the law of his mind, by the law of sin pervading both body and soul, so that he cannot perform that which he is most willing to do. His views of the beauty of holiness, the excellency of the law, his own obligations to obedience, and his pantings after perfect purity, increase as he grows in grace, so that he seems further from the mark than ever, when at the height of his attainments in this present world. He is more deeply convinced as he proceeds, that in him, as a fallen sinner, dwelleth no good thing, that from nature evil only can proceed, that the law can only condemn him, and that 'none but Jesus can do such helpless sinners good.' This conflict often renders him weary of life, and even impatient of living; he could be content to suffer, but he can hardly bear the thought of continuing a self-abhorred sinner; he groans out frequently, "O wretched man "that I am!" whilst he drags about with him the detested body of sin and death, from which he can find no deliverance; and did he not firmly trust in God's mercy and grace through Jesus Christ, his case would be most deplorable. But with this hope, prospect, and support, he manfully sustains the conflict, he rejoices amidst his humiliations, his groans and tears are mingled with hallelujahs, and his conscious vileness renders the Redeemer's love and free salvation doubly precious to his soul. His very anguish for such a cause is the pledge of his felicity; having wrestled and prevailed for the blessing, and seen the face of Emmanuel in peace, he goes on his way halting, (Notes, &c. Gen. xxxii.) his complaints, yea, his unallowed and deeply repented sins, are preparing him for singing more loudly and sweetly, "worthy is "the lamb, that was slain;" and, like the dissonance attending on the tuning of a musical instrument, prepare the way for more delightful melody, when patience hath had its perfect work, and he has "overcome by the blood "of the Lamb, and by the word of his testimony;" and it shall in the mean time be graciously pleaded in his behalf, that "it was not he, but sin that dwelled in him."—But if a man speak on this subject with indifference or satisfaction, if sin dwelling in him be the excuse for crimes committed without remorse or godly sorrow, if he allow the evil, and desire not the good, presuming that he hath all things in Christ; if instead of consenting to the goodness of the law, condemning himself, and loathing his sins, he depreciates the law and extenuates his own guilt; if his utmost willingness be to escape hell at any rate, without longing to be holy, according to the spiritual and good law of God; if he do not "delight in "it after the inward man," nor serve it with the prevailing desire of his mind, but willingly serve the law of sin; then doubtless he is without Christ, whose name he profanes; he is under the law which he hates; and his presumptuous confidence and quietness in such a state only prove, that he is given over to "strong delusion to believe a lie." Nor does this much disputed and abused chapter, more evidently condemn the hope of the proudest Pharisee on earth, than it does that of such a professor of evangelical truth.

NOTES.

CHAP. VIII. V. 1, 2. The apostle had shown, that the believer, being earnestly desirous of obeying the holy law of God, was graciously accepted in Christ, and his failures were ascribed to sin dwelling in him, against his habitual and prevalent inclination, and not imputed to him; and he here proceeds further to state this privilege. While men continue under the law as a covenant, every failure is imputed to them for condemnation; but when they become dead to the law and one with Christ, they are in him by faith, as their Refuge from day to day, and there is no condemnation for them. Their past sins are all blotted out, they are fully justified, and, continually exercising repentance, and faith in his blood and righteousness, their lamented transgressions and deficiencies are pardoned. Thus they are preserved from condemnation, and shall be to the end, and for ever. Their character and conduct likewise distinguish them; for, notwithstanding their painful conflict with indwelling sin, they do not walk after the dictates of corrupt nature, but are habitually influenced by the new principle communicated in regeneration; for "that which is born of the "Spirit is spirit." The former, as "the law of sin and "death," (vii. 23—25,) had once commanded their willing service; but regenerating grace, by "the Spirit of "life in Christ Jesus," and by means of the Gospel, had dethroned the usurper sin, and made them free from his law by efficaciously inducing a contrary conduct. So that, though the remaining power of sin greatly harassed them, and in some instances prevailed, yet, on the whole, they were enabled successfully to resist its authority, and to walk at liberty in obedience to God's commandments.—Some explain "the law of the Spirit of life" of the doctrine of the Gospel, through which the Spirit is communicated, rather than of his commanding influence in the believer's soul; but the latter is the more exact contrast to the "law of sin, and death," from which he is by it set free. 'To be in Christ,' says Mr. Le Clerc, 'is often 'used by St. Paul for being a Christian,' (Marg. Ref.;) 'but if he means only Christians by profession, or only 'being members of the Christian Church, this will by 'no means agree with this place, or any other of like 'nature; since freedom from condemnation—will not 'follow our being Christians in this sense, but upon a 'lively faith in Christ, our union with him by the Spirit, 'and our being so in him as to become new creatures.' (9. 2 Cor. v. 17. Gal. v. 6.) (Whitby.) They who "are in Christ" are Christians; "they walk not after the "flesh, but after the Spirit:" this describes their character; and it is their grand privilege, that there is no condemnation for them.

V. 3, 4. The good and perfect law of God was weak through the flesh, or by means of man's depravity, so that it was impossible for it to bring man to holiness or liberty, any more than to justify him; even as the wholesome laws of the land cannot make men honest; they can only declare how they should act, and denounce penalties, but cannot change the heart, and therefore their impetuous passions break through the feeble restraint without regard to consequences, as the vehement torrent of some full swollen river breaks through or overflows the mound that was placed to impede its course. As the law was therefore inadequate to man's necessity, God was pleased in infinite mercy to send his own Son, to assume our nature, and appear "in the likeness of sinful flesh." Though free from sin, he became subject to those infirmities to which through sin we are exposed; he was accused of many crimes, and numbered with transgressors, and he was punished by the Father as our Surety, as if he had been the greatest of sinners. Thus he was appointed "for sin," or "for "a sin-offering," that God, having "condemned sin in "the flesh," and shown his abhorrence of it by the sufferings of his Son in our flesh, might pardon and justify the believer's person, and execute the sentence of condemnation on his corrupt nature, by its crucifixion and destruction; that so, through his mercy and grace, even the very righteousness required by the law might be fully written in our hearts, and habitually in all its parts performed in our lives, though too imperfectly to justify us, and that hereafter we might be perfectly conformed to the holy law, in its substantial requirement of love to God and his creatures, and obey it fully for evermore. Many expositors explain this of Christ, as One with us, having fulfilled the righteousness of the law in our stead, and of its imputation to those who walk after the Spirit. But the former sense seems more obvious, and best to answer the apostle's design, who was proving, that deliverance from the law, as a covenant, was necessary, in order to our obeying the law as a rule. 'Sanctification, begun in us, is the sure 'evidence of our union with Christ, which is the richest 'fruit of a holy life.' (Beza.) The completion, however, of sanctification, seems especially intended.

V 5—9. The discrimination of character before referred to is here more fully stated. The word flesh, in this connexion, cannot mean the body as opposite to the soul, for out of man's heart proceed even adulteries, fornications and drunkenness; and pride, envy, hatred, are works of the flesh. (Marg. Ref.) That wickedness, the seat of which is immediately in the soul, is more contrary to the image and glory of God, than that in which the body seems more concerned; but indeed the body is no more than the instrument, and the soul is the agent in every sin. The soul of an ungodly man is not spiritual, but carnal; "that which is born of the flesh is flesh." By the flesh we must therefore understand corrupt nature, as derived from Adam to all his posterity, and perhaps this term is used, because the soul is become the caterer to man's fleshly lusts, and the whole man is, as it were, immersed and sunk in the flesh. They, therefore, who are born after the flesh, but not after the Spirit, and who go after the leadings of the flesh, mind the things of the flesh; they are sagacious about them; they choose, desire, pursue, savour, and delight in them; they seek their happiness in the riches, pleasures, honours and perishing vanities of this world, or in things of an unholy nature, which must be left at death, and which bear no relation to heavenly felicity. About these, their abilities, imaginations, contrivance, and time, are employed, and they give them a decided preference to spiritual things, in their habitual judgment and conduct. But they, who are "born "of the Spirit," and walk after the leadings of the new and spiritual nature, understand, choose, pursue, relish, and supremely value such things, as pertain to the spiritual and divine life, and such as will endure for ever. The favour of God, communion with him, renewal to his image, and a life spent to his glory, most occupy their imaginations, desires, and attention, and have the pre-eminent place in their choice and conduct, notwithstanding all the opposition from indwelling sin. This habitual prevalency stamps the character as carnal or spiritual; so that, if a man be carnal in the prevailing judgment, temper, and affections of his mind, he is under condemnation, dead in sin, and meet for destruction; but if he be spiritual in the habitual prevailing temper of his soul, he is evidently alive to God, and at peace with him, and the spiritual mind is, in proportion as it prevails, the very essence of life and peace. The importance of this distinction is manifest, "because the carnal mind is enmity against God;" man's apostacy originated in his preferring the satisfaction to be found in the creatures through disobedience, to the felicity to be enjoyed in God by obedience. This is in fact the universal idolatry; and men thus preferring self-satisfaction and created good to the favour and service of God, not only rebel against him, but become enemies to him and haters of him. For his holy law demanding their whole heart, and forbidding their favourite pursuits, and all his perfections being engaged to execute vengeance on transgressors, the carnal mind disdaining control, being averse from his service, and bent on sinful indulgence, rises in enmity against the authority, precepts, threatenings, power, and perfections of God. Therefore, this carnal mind is not subject to the divine law, and indeed it cannot be so; it is morally unable to do any thing but revolt against it, and refuse obedience to it. An enemy may be reconciled, a carnal man may become spiritual; but enmity in the abstract cannot be reconciled, and therefore the carnal mind must be crucified and destroyed, (vi. 6.) and as no rational creature of God can please him, who refuses subjection to the holy law, it is evident, that unregenerate men cannot please God in any of their services, by whatever name they are called. Thus evangelical religion is equally remote from self-righteousness, which cleaves to the law as a covenant, and antinomianism, which rejects it as a rule, in doing which men cannot please God. "But," says the apostle, "Ye are not in "the flesh, but in the Spirit," regenerate and spiritual, and therefore willingly, though not perfectly, subject to the law, "if so be the Spirit of God dwell in you," as in his temple; but if any man, Jew, Gentile, or nominal Christian, remain destitute of the sanctifying Spirit of Christ, he certainly does not belong to him as one of his accepted disciples, and dying in that state, he must perish as an enemy of God. If the flesh be explained of the body, as distinguished from the soul or spirit, it follows, that no man can please God while he lives in this world, and that the Romans were disembodied spirits, which is palpably absurd; yet the interpretation of other Scriptures concerning the flesh and spirit, by many learned men, unavoidably lead to this absurdity; nor is it much less unreasonable and unscriptural to aver, that living under the Mosaic dispensation was "being in the flesh," and professing the Gospel, especially if miraculous powers were vouchsafed, was being in the Spirit. (Matt. vii. 21—23. 1 Cor. xiii. 1—3.) Yet these seem the only ways, by which the above plain and natural interpretation can be evaded.

V. 10, 11. If the Spirit of Christ dwell in a man, Christ himself is in him, by his power and influence, and by his image renewed in him. In this case, though the body is mortal and must soon die, because of the disobedience of Adam, and the man's personal transgressions, yet the spirit has life abiding in it, the soul is alive to God, and has begun its holy felicity, which shall endure for ever, through the righteousness of the second Adam, in whom it is interested. So that when the body drops into dust, the soul being perfectly delivered from sin will enter heaven; and the almighty God, who raised Jesus from the dead, will raise the mortal body also incorruptible and glorious, by the omnipotence of his indwelling Spirit, who will not always leave his temple to lie mouldering in the dust. (Marg. Ref.) Then sin and all its effects will be for ever done with. 'Several readers may be aware, that another 'interpretation has been given of these verses, especially 'by the celebrated Mr. Locke, who explains quickening 'the mortal body by sanctifying the immortal soul.' (Doddridge.) But the various, and often unnatural, interpretations given to several passages in these chapters, would require far more time and room particularly to notice them, and make remarks on them, than the nature of this publication can admit of. In general, when the interpretation is plausible, and supported by probable reasons, the author thinks it incumbent on him to notice it, in one way or other; but when, on careful investigation, it appears to him that this is not the case, he is contented to pass it over in silence. He believes, that few, who have impartially considered the subject, will refuse to join him in the following verdict, concerning Mr. Locke's interpretation. 'He hath said nothing of weight against 'the sense.' (Whitby.) That is, the sense above given of the passage.

V. 12, 13. As death and all misery resulted from man's having preferred his own inclinations to the will of God, and as all felicity was communicated by the renewal of the soul to holiness, so Christians should not consider themselves to be indebted at all to the flesh, though it still lived and wrought in them. They had already ruined themselves by complying with its suggestions, and it could have no further demands on them, now that Christ had rescued them from merited destruction. Indeed, if any habitually lived according to its corrupt lustings, they would certainly perish in their sins, notwithstanding their profession of the Gospel; but, on the other hand, if through the influences of the Holy Spirit, and according to the tendency of the new nature, they denied, subdued, and proceeded to extirpate their sinful lusts, and so to mortify and lop off those actions which thence arose, they would prove themselves alive to God through Christ, and their spiritual life would proportionably abound. The natural appetites of the body need only to be moderated, regulated, and subordinated, but the carnal desires of the body of sin and death, the old Adam, the flesh, with its affections and lusts, must be extirpated, and all its actings terminated. This is to be done by the Holy Spirit, yet we are to do it through him, and by dependence on him. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 14—17. The regenerating work of the Holy Spirit brings us, through Christ, into the family of God, and evidences our sonship according to the choice and purpose of the Father. Therefore all they, and they only, who give themselves up to the leading of the Spirit, are the children of God. The Holy Spirit will lead a man into the knowledge of the Lord and of his own heart, into humble repentance, faith in Christ, holy love, communion with God, and delight in his worship and commandments; and he will lead him away from vanity and iniquity, pride and discord; and in proportion as we willingly give up ourselves to be led in such paths, we may know our adoption. The apostle further observed, that confirmed believers had not received again the spirit of bondage to serve God from slavish fear; this they must do, who continue under the law as a covenant, if they serve him at all. The Mosaic dispensation had a greater tendency to foster this temper than the Christian religion has; and the Jews, too generally considering the whole as a covenant of works, worshipped God in this slavish manner. But most of the Roman converts had not been under the Mosaic law, yet they are spoken of indiscriminately, as having been formerly influenced by the spirit of bondage; we may therefore suppose that their first convictions were intended, under which awakened sinners act more from fear and selfish principles than they do afterwards, ab-staining from many sins without hating them, through dread of consequences, and practising duties without loving them. These convictions proceed from the moving of the Spirit of God upon their minds, and prepare them for receiving Christ by faith; but they are very different from their disposition, after they are brought into the full light and liberty of the Gospel, and have received "the Spirit "of adoption." Then they are taught to serve God with filial reverence, confidence, love, gratitude, submission, zeal, and satisfaction; and are especially taught and encouraged to call upon him, as a Father, for all things they want, and in all their trials, notwithstanding their conscious unworthiness. The word Abba is Syriac for Father, and the use of different languages in this connexion sweetly indicates the harmony of Jews and Gentiles, and of different nations, in this filial worship of God according to the Gospel. Thus the Holy Spirit, by producing in believers the tempers and affections of children, as described in the scripture, most manifestly attests their adoption into God's family. This is not done by any voice, immediate revelation or impulse, or merely by any text brought to the mind, (for all these things are equivocal and delusory,) but by coinciding with the testimony of their own consciences, as to their uprightness in embracing the Gospel, and giving themselves up to the service of God. So that, whilst they are examining themselves concerning the reality of their conversion, and find scriptural evidence of it, the Holy Spirit from time to time shines upon his own work, excites their holy affections into lively exercise, renders them very efficacious upon their conduct, and thus puts the matter beyond doubt; for while they feel the spirit of dutiful children towards God, they become satisfied concerning his paternal love to them. This being ascertained, they may further infer themselves to be the heirs of the heavenly inheritance, and of God himself as their Portion, even joint heirs with Christ the beloved Son of the Father, being accepted in him, and appointed with him to share the purchased inheritance; and of this they may be still more fully assured, if they patiently endure sufferings, after his example and for his sake, in the hope of being also glorified with him.

V. 18—23. The apostle had an abundant share of these sufferings; but upon the most exact and deliberate computation of them, he found them not worthy to be put in competition with that glorious recompense which will be bestowed on Christians, or that glory which will be revealed to them and accomplished in them. So that it would be the greatest folly imaginable for him to shrink from the pursuit of this promised felicity, through the dread of the most terrible of these transient sufferings. Indeed, the whole visible creation seems to wait with earnest expectation for that important period, when the children of God shall be manifested in the glory which is prepared for them; and in this it resembles a man, who with out-stretched neck looks, and waits with impatient longing, for the arrival of some beloved and expected friend. For the creation itself became subject to vanity and disorder through man's apostacy; not willingly, as he did, but by a kind of constraint, through the guilt and righteous condemnation of Adam and his posterity. By this awful dispensation, the Lord subjected the creatures of this lower world, and even the visible creation, to vanity. Every thing seems perverted from its intended use; the inanimate creatures are pressed into the service of man's rebellion; the luminaries of heaven give him light, by which to work wickedness; the fruits of the earth are sacrificed to his luxury, intemperance, and ostentation; its bowels are ransacked for metals, from which arms are forged for public and private murder and revenge, or to gratify his avarice, and excite him to fraud, oppression, and war. The animal tribes are subject to pain and death through man's sin: and their sufferings are exceedingly increased by his cruelty, who, instead of a kind master, is become their inhuman butcher and tyrant. So that every thing is in an unnatural state; the good creatures of God appear evil through man's abuse of them, and even the enjoyment originally to be found in them is turned into vexation, bitterness, and disappointment, by his idolatrous love of them and expectation from them. Yet this is "in hope;" God intends to rescue the creation from this confused state, and to deliver it from being thus held in bondage to man's depravity, that it may partake of and minister to the glorious liberty of His children. So that, we are assured, the whole creation groans in every part, as with one sympathizing expression of anguish, (like a woman in the pains of travail, not as one in the agonies of death,) expecting, and impatiently longing for, a glorious event of all these distractions. This it hath done ever since the fall, and will do in a measure till the end of the world. The miseries also of the human species, through their own and each other's wickedness, as well as the state of the inferior creatures, declare the world to be in such a situation, as is not intended always to continue.

24 For we are [q] saved by hope: [r] but hope that is seen is not hope: for what a man seeth, why doth he yet hope for?

25 But if we hope for that we see not, then do we [s] with patience wait for it.

26 Likewise the Spirit also helpeth our [t] infirmities: [u] for we know not what we should pray for as we ought: [x] but the Spirit itself maketh intercession for us [y] with groanings which cannot be uttered.

27 And [z] he that searcheth the hearts, [a] knoweth what is the mind of the Spirit, * because [b] he maketh intercession for the saints [c] according to the will of God.

28 And [d] we know that all things work together for good, to [e] them that love God, to them who are [f] the called according to his purpose.

29 For [g] whom he did foreknow, [h] he also did predestinate [i] to be conformed to the image of his Son, [k] that he might be the first-born among many brethren.

30 Moreover, [l] whom he did predestinate, them he also called: [m] and whom he called, them he also justified: [n] and whom he justified, them he also glorified.

31 What [o] shall we then say to these things? [p] If God be for us, who can be against us?

Nay, not only do all men, and all creatures here below, as it were, groan under the burdens imposed on them through sin, but even the children of God, who have the Spirit of adoption, and his holy consolations as the first fruits and pledge of their everlasting felicity, yet groan within themselves, through manifold pains, conflicts, temptations, and difficulties, and especially through the disquietude of indwelling sin, and in waiting for their adoption, their public admission into the family of God, and to the enjoyment of their inheritance, at that season, when their bodies also shall be redeemed from the grave, incorruptible immortal, and glorious. Then Satan, sin, death, misery, and all wicked creatures, will be confined to hell, and the rest of God's creation will appear glorious, pure, beautiful, orderly, and happy, in every respect answering the end for which it was formed, and in nothing abused to contrary purposes. The sufferings of animals, though many, yet being unfeared and transient, are doubtless overbalanced by their enjoyments, and to infer an individual resurrection of them, from this passage, is surely one of the wildest reveries that ever entered into the mind of any thinking man.

V. 24—27. True believers have been actually brought into a state of safety, but their comfort consists in hope rather than fruition. Now that which is the object of sight, sense, or enjoyment, cannot properly be called hope; for how can a man be said to hope for the vision or fruition of that which he at present beholds and enjoys? The future felicity of the saints will chiefly consist in seeing God face to face, some glimpses by faith they here see, as in a glass darkly; for the full vision of his glory they hope and wait in reliance on his promise, and by patient continuance in well-doing amidst manifold trials and temptations; and from this hope they cannot be diverted, by the vain expectation of finding satisfaction in the things of time and sense. For, though their infirmities are many and great, and they would soon be overpowered if left to themselves, yet the Spirit of God so helps them and supports them, that they are not entirely overcome. And as their strength and comfort amid conflicts must be obtained by prayer, and as they are so ignorant, forgetful, or unbelieving, that they know not what to ask for, or how to ask for any thing with proper affections, so the same Spirit compassionately assists their memories, excites their desires and hopes, and increases their faith. Thus he becomes an inward intercessor, by suggesting such prayers as are pleasing to God, and meet to be accepted through our heavenly Advocate. These prayers do not consist in copious and fluent expressions, which are often destitute of suitable affections, but in earnest longings for and believing expectations of, spiritual blessings, which are sometimes productive rather of groans than of words, or they are uttered in broken sentences and detached and earnest ejaculations, rather than a continued prayer, as implying more than a man can find words to utter. Perhaps the humble, broken-hearted supplicant, when thus groaning out his desires after pardon and deliverance from sin, is ashamed to offer such incoherent requests; but the heart-searching God understands and approves this energetic language, which expresses the mind of the Spirit, when making intercession for the saints in whom he dwells, according to the will of God, both in his promise, commandment, and providence; and such prayers will surely be answered, when the well-worded addresses of formalists will be rejected. Mind of, &c. 'The phrase is here the very same that was used in the sixth verse, and expresses 'not merely the meaning, but the temper and disposition 'of the mind, as under the influences of the divine Spirit, 'pursuing and breathing after such blessings as suit its 'rational and immortal nature.' (Doddridge.) The clause in one of the collects of our liturgy seems well to express this, 'That they may love the things which thou com'mandest, and desire that which thou dost promise.' When the Holy Spirit produces this state of the judgment and affections, the prayers which spring from it will be graciously accepted by the holy heart-searching God.

V. 28--31. From the preceding considerations the apostle assuredly concluded, that all events in life or death would concur in promoting the eternal good of every true believer, however bitter and painful they might at present be; as nothing could ever defeat the great end proposed in all the dispensations of God respecting them, even their everlasting salvation. Providential appointments are doubtless primarily intended, but as these often lead men into temptation, and so prove occasions of sin, we could have no assurance that they would "all work together for "good," if we were absolutely to except the effects of our own sin and folly. Indeed, the sins even of true believers are not always over-ruled for their increase of present grace, or of future glory; in this respect they suffer loss, and are saved as by fire; yet the whole concurs, as one complex plan, to prepare them for the inheritance intended for them, and many of their own mistakes and miscarriages, being deeply repented of, work together eminently for their humiliation and increase of grateful love. As far as they act in character, and live in the habitual exercise of "love to God," all things will concur in augmenting their final recompense. When they act out of character, corrections, and perhaps terrors, will be employed to bring them back again; and if a man allow himself in sin, expecting to derive good from it, he "does evil that good "may come," he "sins on, that grace may abound," he bears the broad mark of a hypocrite, and his damnation will be just. So that we need not invalidate this animating assurance, to guard it from the abuse of wicked men, as some have done, to the great discouragement of humble Christians, who fear nothing so much, even in their sharpest afflictions, as their own lamented propensity to sin. The persons intended once did not love God, but they were called into a state of reconciliation and love to him, according to his eternal purpose and choice of them, which he will never suffer to be frustrated. Having seen good to permit the fall and apostacy of man, he looked upon the whole human species as deserving of destruction, and meet for it: yet purposing to provide and reveal a gracious salvation to them, for the glory of his name, he knew that they would as certainly reject it, as they would break his holy law. For reasons therefore not revealed to us, he determined to leave some deservedly to perish in obstinate enmity, and graciously to recover others by regeneration. These "he fore-knew," not merely in respect of external privileges, or as a part of favoured nations, but as individually chosen to eternal life; for in consequence of this fore-knowledge, "he predestinated," or before decreed, them "to be conformed to the image of his "Son." Here they are in part renewed to his holy image, and walk in his steps, and, having passed like Jesus through many sufferings, they will hereafter be completely conformed to his holy human nature, both in body and soul; that so he may appear among them as the first begotten and Head of the many brethren, which shall constitute the family of God, that being admitted through him to be children and heirs, they may thus be made meet with him to enjoy their inheritance. As this was the determinate purpose and fore-knowledge of God respecting them, so all the intermediate steps were equally predetermined. Thus the Lord calls to repentance, faith in Christ, and newness of life, every one, whom he hath predestinated; he fully justifieth, through the righteousness of Christ, every one whom he calleth; and he will finally glorify every one whom he justifieth.—Sanctification is not expressly mentioned in this golden chain; but predestination to be conformed to the image of Christ, effectual calling, and final glory, so describe the beginning, the progress, and the consummation of sanctification, that no omission can in this respect be imputed to the apostle. In the language of faith and hope, he speaks of the whole work as already done, because ensured by the purposes and promises of God, and he demands what can be said unto, or against, such things? For if God be thus freely and absolutely our unchangeable Friend, and thus determined to bless us with everlasting felicity, who, or what, can be so against us, as to defeat his gracious purpose? Or what need have we to fear the rage and power of all creatures, if they should combine against us? From this and similar passages, some persons have absurdly talked of our having been justified from eternity, &c. but the fixed intention of doing any thing is perfectly distinct from the actual performance of it. God as absolutely determined the final glorification of every believer, as he did the justification of every elect person; we might then just as well say, they have been glorified in body and soul from all eternity; this could not be more absurd or unscriptural, than the notion of being justified from eternity, and probably it would be less capable of abuse. Dr. Whitby says, that all the fathers before Augustine understood this passage of those, whom God foresaw would love him.—But does God foresee that any of our race, while unregenerate, will love him? And is not the clause, "called "according to his purpose," of the same import as regenerated? And can this choice of some, rather than others, of our fallen race, because of something spiritually good in them, as the ground of it, in order to their being thus called, possibly consist with the doctrines of original sin, or the total depravity of human nature, and of a regeneration from the death of sin to the life of righteousness? Does not it border on Pelagianism? Again, if all the Gentiles, or all the inhabitants of any one nation, whom God foreknew, and determined to call into his Church, be really conformed to the image of Christ, and justified, and shall, without exception, partake of eternal glory, the interpretation of the passage, as referring to the election of collective bodies, may stand; but not otherwise. So that, if this were the only passage, in which the humiliating subject was expressly mentioned, we might confidently maintain, that the doctrine of individual predestination to eternal life, and the authority of the apostle as an inspired writer, must stand or fall together. Nothing more fully shows this, than the difficulties to which its learned and sagacious opposers are reduced, and the different grounds on which they rest the cause; for they scarcely agree in any thing, but in determining to oppose the most natural and obvious meaning of the words. Perhaps the apostle's doctrine was never more justly expressed by any shall he not with him also freely give us all things?

33 Who [t] shall lay any thing to the charge [u] of God's elect? [x] It is God that justifieth.

34 Who [y] is he that condemneth? [z] It is Christ that died, yea, rather that is risen again, [a] who is even at the right hand of God, [b] who also maketh intercession for us.

35 Who [c] shall separate us from the love of Christ? [d] shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword?

36 As it is written, [e] For thy sake we are killed all the day long; we are accounted as [f] sheep for the slaughter.

37 Nay, [g] in all these things we are more than conquerors, through [h] him that loved us.

38 For [i] I am persuaded, [k] that neither death, nor life, nor angels, [l] nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come,

39 [m] Nor [n] height, nor [o] depth, nor any other creature, [p] shall be able to separate us from [q] the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord.

uninspired writer, than in the former part of the seventeenth article of our church. 'Predestination unto life 'is the everlasting purpose of God, whereby, (before the 'foundations of the world were laid,) he had constantly 'decreed, by his counsel, secret to us, to deliver from 'curse and damnation those whom he had chosen in Christ 'out of mankind, and to bring them by Christ to everlasting salvation, as vessels made to honour. Wherefore 'they, which be endued with so excellent a benefit of God, 'be called according to God's purpose, by his Spirit working in due season, they through grace obey the calling, 'they be justified freely; they be made the sons of God by 'adoption, they be made like unto the image of his only 'begotten Son Jesus Christ, they walk religiously in good 'works, and at length, by God's mercy, they attain to everlasting felicity.'

V. 32—34. The omnipotence and omniscience of God had been, in the preceding verse, opposed to the puny efforts of every enemy; here his former benefits are shown to be assured pledges of final felicity to all real Christians. When the holiness of God and man's sinfulness barred the way to happiness, his free love of such rebels and enemies induced him to give his own Son to be their Surety and Sacrifice, having willingly assumed their nature, in order to bear their sins; and in this, the Father "spared him not, "but delivered him up" to agonies, ignominy, and death, notwithstanding his personal dignity and excellency, the perfection of his obedience, and his own inconceivable love of him. Thus he bore the curse instead of all his people, and so expiated their guilt when enemies; and having, in virtue of that atonement and his own eternal choice, called them into a state of peace with him, and taught them to love and obey him, how can it be supposed that he will now withhold any thing from them? All things in heaven and earth, the universal creation, yea, the everlasting enjoyment of the Creator himself as their Portion, are not so great a display of his free love to them, as the gift of his co-equal Son to be the atonement on the cross for their sins; and the rest necessarily follow upon their union with him, and interest in him. The emphasis is evidently here laid, not on Christ, as incarnate, being given up to death for us, but in God's giving his own Son (ἰδιου) to become incarnate for such a purpose. Who then can lay any thing to the charge of God's elect, whose election is manifested by their being called to the fellowship of Christ, when it is God, against whom they have sinned, who hath at such a price completely justified them? Satan may accuse them, the world may revile them, their brethren may suspect and censure them, their own consciences may reproach them with many sins, the law may convict and condemn them for many former and latter transgressions; but God himself pleads their cause, he pronounces them righteous, silences their accusers, pacifies their consciences, clears their characters, and shows the law magnified, and justice satisfied, in the obedience and sufferings of their Surety, and who then can make good any charge against them? If we look forward to the day of judgment, who shall then condemn them? The judge himself will be the same Person who loved them, died for their sins, and rose again for their justification, and who now at the right hand of the Father ever liveth to plead in their behalf, and to use his almighty power for their benefit! Even now, he presents their services for acceptance before his Father's throne, he quashes all accusations brought against them, defeats the machinations of their enemies, manages all things for their good, and is perfecting his work in them; and will he then forsake the work of his own hands, and at last condemn them to hell? It is impossible!

V. 35—39. As infinite and unchangeable power and love are engaged in behalf of all believers, and the mercy already shown them is greater than what is further needful, they may even triumph on the field of battle, and exult amidst their conflicts and groans; for who shall separate them from the love of Christ, who hath chosen, redeemed, called, and justified them? Shall trials, persecutions, or calamities of any kind, degree, or continuance? Shall the sword of war, or that of the executioner? Indeed it had been written of old that God's harmless people were, and would be, butchered like sheep, (Marg. Ref.) but, instead of being thus separated from his love, they would be brought to the more complete enjoyment of it, and so not only escape unhurt, or just come off victorious, but also be made more than conquerors, even immense gainers, by their sufferings, through the supporting grace of their loving Saviour. Indeed the apostle was fully persuaded, or assured, (Marg. Ref.) that neither the love of life, nor its snares and trials, nor the fear, agony, or separating stroke of death in any form, nor the machinations of evil angels, or of all the principalities and powers of darkness, or the ungodly persecuting princes of this world, nor any present calamities, or future unknown changes or undiscovered scenes, nor the height of prosperity, nor the depth of adversity, nor the highest created power, nor the deepest plots of subtle enemies, nor any creature, nor all creatures, shall ever prevail to separate true believers from the love of God in Christ Jesus towards them; as his purposes are unchangeable, his engagements irrevocable, and his power invincible. It is frivolous to say, that sin, being no creature of God, may separate the believer from his love, notwithstanding all this; for such a restriction wholly invalidates the passage. Tribulation, persecution, the terror of death, the frowns or smiles of the world, and the machinations of evil spirits, have no tendency to separate us from the love of God, except as they prove occasions of sin. Professed believers in such circumstances often forsake God and perish, but "all his saints are in his hand," and are "kept by his power through faith unto salvation," so that they either resist and overcome every temptation, or, if baffled and foiled, they are brought back by convictions and corrections, with penitent tears and fervent supplications, and they dread suffering, chiefly because they fear lest it should prove the occasion of indwelling-sin gaining some victory over them. If a man take encouragement to sin from such assurances, he renders it extremely probable that he has no interest in them; no one can triumph on this ground, who has not Scriptural evidence of his conversion, or can take the warrantable comfort of them, except he is at present striving against sin, and harassed by fears lest some future event should give that detested and dreaded foe a fatal advantage over him. We must not therefore take the cordials from the weary and almost fainting combatants, because others unwarrantably seize upon, and fatally intoxicate themselves with them. (Note, John x. 28—30.)

CHAP. IX.

The apostle laments the unbelief of his countrymen, and declares his willingness to endure any thing for their salvation, 1—3. He shows the privileges of Israel as a nation, 4, 5; and the difference between them and the true Israel, 6—8. He illustrates his subject by the examples of Isaac, of Jacob and Esau, and of Pharaoh; and thus shows the freeness of God's mercy, and the sovereignty of his election, 9—18. He answers objections to his doctrine, 19—21: and proves it from the prophets, 22—29; and evinces, that the Jews came short of the blessing, (which the Gentiles obtained by faith,) because they sought it by the works of the law, and rejected Christ, 30—33.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

The terrors of the law, and our own consciousness of guilt, should endear to us the free salvation of the Gospel; and urge us to flee for refuge to Christ, that we may be safe in him, as Noah in the ark, when threatened destruction shall overwhelm all ungodly men. Whilst we desire exemption from condemnation, let us seek for grace to enable us to walk, not after the flesh, but after the Spirit; thus it will be evident, that "the law of the "Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made us free from "the law of sin and death," and that the grace of the Gospel hath already done more toward our sanctification, than the law could ever do for those who desire to be under it. For if we truly rely on the sacrifice of the Son of God, in the likeness of sinful flesh, for our sins, we shall find that our old nature is condemned and must be crucified, we shall join in putting this sentence in execution, and long for the righteousness of the law to be fulfilled in us, even as it was by our Surety. Of this, our present habitual "walk after the Spirit," is an earnest and sure pledge; but a carnal mind and conversation are evidences, that a man is dead in sin and under the curse of the law, however he may speak about the grace of the Gospel; for they, who are alive to God, and at peace with him, are spiritual in their judgment, affections, and habitual walk, though they grieve that they are not more so. But "the carnal mind is enmity against God;" no unregenerate man can delight in his holy law, or be subject to it, and how can it be expected that God should be pleased with such enemies and rebels? We should therefore especially examine ourselves whether the Spirit of Christ dwell in us; for if this be not our case, we belong not to him, are not in his kingdom, and shall have our portion among the servants of Satan, unless this entire change be wrought in our hearts.

V. 10—18.

If the Spirit of Christ have taken possession of our hearts, and renewed his holy image there, the death of our mortal bodies will perfect the life of our immortal souls, which have now eternal life abiding in them, and through the Redeemer's righteousness our bodies too shall be raised again, to share that glorious felicity. What then can a carnal life present to our view, worthy to be put in competition with this noble prize of our high calling? All we owe to the flesh is a holy revenge for the injuries already done, and the hinderances continually given us; and instead of rendering our state doubtful by at all living after it, we should, by the Spirit, continually endeavour more entirely to mortify it, and repress all its actings. Thus giving up ourselves to be led by the Spirit, our adoption will be manifest; we shall gradually be emancipated from our servile fears, and shall trust, walk with, and obey God, as our reconciled Father; the Holy Spirit will witness with our consciences that we have the temper of loving, obedient children towards him, and support us with the joyful prospect of our inheritance, amidst our sufferings in the way to glory: while our present trials will appear light, compared with the felicity reserved for us.

V. 19—27.

Sin has filled the world with unspeakable disorder and misery, all creatures seem to proclaim man's fatal apostacy, and to recommend the precious salvation of Christ. While men are evidently at war with their Maker and with each other, and the earth is become a great slaughter-house and burying ground to its inhabitants, the inferior creatures are forced into the service of man's lusts by the most abominable perversion of them. Thus the creation groans under bondage to human depravity, every creature seems to abet man's rebellion, or to be an instrument of his crimes; the very heathens could see the strange state of the world, though they saw neither the cause nor the cure of it. But the Gospel opens a brighter prospect, a glorious crisis approaches, of which all things seem in anxious expectation. When the children of God shall be manifested, and separated from his implacable foes, a complete deliverance from this bondage will be given to all; but Satan and his obstinate adherents, and sin, deformity, vanity, and misery, shall be seen no where but in the bottomless pit. May we then give diligence to ensure our interest in this redemption, and to possess the first-fruits of the Spirit! Then our groans under our share of this universal ruin, while we wait for our final adoption, will be in hope; we shall learn to disregard the perishing things which are seen, and patiently to expect and wait for the good things that are unseen and eternal. The spirit of God will in these things help us under our infirmities; and, notwithstanding our own insufficiency, we shall by his influence pray to our heavenly Father, with such large and spiritual desires, and such unutterable pantings after his salvation, as shall ensure a gracious answer, and abundant supplies of every needful blessing.

V. 28—39.

If we are but assured that we really love God, and desire to keep his commandments, we may rest satisfied that all things shall finally terminate to our greatest advantage. For the love of God, in the hearts of those who were once enmity to him, proves that they have been called according to his eternal purpose, in order to be conformed to the image of his Son, and made meet as his brethren to be joint heirs with him. But none can have any ground to think themselves predestinated, called, or justified, or to expect to be glorified, except they love God, bear the image of Christ, walk in his steps, and aim to obey and honour him; and whatever men may object against these things, they, who are thus chosen, called, and justified, shall without doubt be eternally glorified, nor will a single exception be found to this rule, though many will at length appear to have deceived themselves and others. If God has determined to save us, who can destroy us? If he spared not his own Son, but delivered him to death for us, how should he refuse any thing to us? If this was not too large a gift for his enemies, what can he withhold from his friends and children? If he justifies us, who can condemn us? If our crucified and risen Jesus pleads and fights for us, who can plead or fight against us, with any possibility of prevailing? If the Judge himself is our Friend, who can pronounce a sentence against us? Or what can separate us from the love of him who bled for us, when we were so vile, that hell was our desert, and the doom for which we were meet? Whilst therefore we rejoice in these privileges and this security, and cheerfully expect to be more than conquerors in every conflict, and immense gainers by every loss and tribulation, till death be swallowed up in victory, let us show the holiness of the doctrine, by sparing none of our lusts, shrinking from no hardship or expense in the cause of Christ, willingly enduring our cross, obeying his commandments, and being "steadfast, unmoveable, and always abounding in his work, knowing that our labour is not in vain "in the Lord."

NOTES.

CHAP. IX. V. 1—3. This appeal is evidently equivalent to a solemn oath. Now, an oath being an act of religious worship, the apostle, by thus appealing to Jesus Christ, and to the Holy Ghost, clearly shows that he considered them as entitled to religious worship. From the apostle's arguing so strenuously for a free salvation by faith alone, without any respect to the Mosaic law, or the peculiar privileges of the Jews, it might have been supposed, that he had no great attachment to his countrymen, or even that the persecutions which he had endured from them had set him against them. Being therefore about still further to discuss the subject, of the rejection of the Jews and the calling of the Gentiles, and to resolve the whole into the sovereign electing love of God, he introduced these topics, by expressing in the most energetic language his cordial affection for his people. He spoke the truth as in the presence of Christ his Judge, and with a solemn appeal to him, that he did in no degree deviate from it; his conscience also, being enlightened and directed by the Holy Ghost, bare witness to his sincerity in declaring, that the unbelief and rejection of the Jews excited exceedingly great disquietude and depression, and constant grief, in his heart. Insomuch, that he would even willingly submit to be treated as an Anathema, or accursed, after the manner of Christ, to be excommunicated from his visible Church, loaded with infamy, crucified, or in any way put to the utmost pain and disgrace; or even for a time to be excluded from all the comfort of communion with Christ, and shut up under the deepest horror and distress of mind which could be endured without sin: if by any personal sufferings of his own, that could consist with his final salvation, he might rescue his beloved brethren and kinsmen from that national and personal destruction, which he saw about to come upon them for their obstinate unbelief. (Note, Ex. xxxii. 32.) This seems to be the utmost that the apostle could mean, as it would be utterly unlawful, on any consideration whatever, to wish to be eternally miserable, and an implacable enemy of God, as all who perish will be. (Marg. Ref.) 'I 'could even wish, (if it were proper to make such a wish, 'if it would avail to make so great a multitude happy,) 'I could even wish so great a blessing to my brethren, 'though with the loss of my own happiness.' (Whitby.) —The preposition απο, here translated from Christ, may be rendered, after the example of Christ. "Whom I serve "from my forefathers;" that is, after the example of my forefathers. (2 Tim. i. 3.)

V. 4, 5. The apostle was peculiarly grieved, to think that all the distinguished favours shown to his people should terminate in the rejection of them for opposing Christ. They were the descendants of Israel, who wrestled with God and prevailed; they had long been the professed worshippers of JEHOVAH, to whom the typical adoption pertained. The covenants made with Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Aaron, and David, the law given at mount Sinai, and the national covenant grounded on it, belonged to them, and were so many peculiar honours and advantages towards their becoming the spiritual people of God. The worship at the temple, which was both typical of Christ's salvation, and the means of grace and communion with God, and the ark of the covenant, the symbol and pledge of the Lord's gracious presence with them, had for ages been their glory. All the promises concerning Christ and his salvation were immediately given and preserved to them: they were honourable by their descent from the ancient patriarchs, who walked with God, and were accepted by him; and finally, the expected Messiah had been born among them, as one of their nation according to the flesh; even He, who is also "God over all" creatures, blessed and praised throughout all worlds, and to all eternity; to this the apostle affixed his cordial Amen. The expression, "according to the flesh," implies that Christ had a far higher and nobler nature; even as when Paul used it concerning the Jews his brethren, &c. (3.) he intimated his sorrow that they were not his brethren, as the children of God, born of the Spirit, and believers in Christ. This, with every other consideration, undeniably proves, that the apostle here meant, in the most decided manner, to attest the Deity of Christ, as one with the Father, and equally the object of universal and everlasting adoration. —There is no example, either in the New Testament, or in the Greek translation of the old Testament, in which the doxology, "Blessed be God," is expressed in the same words, and arranged in the same manner, as in this place. So that the only way, in which the Socinians and Arians have attempted to evade the conclusion, unavoidably deducible from this text, namely, by rendering the clause, "Who is over all, God be blessed for evermore;" rests on a most harsh and unnatural construction, of which no example can be adduced, at the same time that it destroys the antithesis, without which the verse would be destitute of propriety and animation.

V. 6—9. Though the Jews had rejected the Gospel, and were cast off by the Lord, it must not be supposed that his word had failed of accomplishment. Their national covenant had been fulfilled to them, till it was finally forfeited; the promises respecting the Messiah had been performed, and the spiritual covenant and promises did not belong to them as a nation, but to such of them only as believed, in common with other believers; for all were not the true "Israel of God," who were naturally descended from Jacob. Indeed, this had been intimated in the case of Abraham and his seed; for the special covenant, made with him in favour of his children, did not include all his posterity; but it was limited to the line of Isaac, when the Lord assured him, "that in Isaac should his "seed be called." So that his children, in the ordinary course of things, were not all adopted as the children of God even in a typical sense; but those only, who sprang from him according to the promise, and by the extraordinary power of God performing it, when Sarah was naturally past child-bearing. (Marg. Ref.) The apostle evidently speaks of a true Israel among the descendants of Israel, a remnant, as distinguished from the nation at large; and he introduces the case of Abraham and his two sons, and afterwards that of Esau and Jacob, not as examples, but as illustrations of his main subject. If this were carefully noted, the perplexity which involves the reasonings of many learned men on this passage would in a great measure vanish. "The children of the pro" mise" are 'those, whom God gives to Abraham, by 'a spiritual generation, whether alone, as in the case of 'us Gentiles, or added to the carnal generation, as in the 'case of Isaac, and of all believing Jews.' 'They who 'interpret "the children of promise" 'to mean those, 'who by faith embrace the promise; say indeed, what is 'fact, but do not speak with suitable precision; for the 'apostle does not in this place distinguish the children of 'Abraham from others by their faith as known; but he 'discourses concerning the primary cause, that is, the 'fountain of their faith itself, namely, the eternal purpose 'of gratuitous election.' (Beza.) Isaac was promised some time before his birth; and the faithfulness and power of God having fulfilled that promise, he was "the child "of promise," in whom Abraham's "seed should be "called;" and in whose "Seed the nations should be "blessed:" but Ishmael was not thus previously promised, and the chosen nation, which was to inherit Canaan, and from whom the Messiah was to spring, would not descend from him, but from Isaac. In like manner, all the descendants of Israel were not entitled to the spiritual blessings of the covenant, but only "the remnant according "to the election of grace," which was found among them; and these, being regenerated and having believed in Christ, were brought into the family of believing Abraham, as the children of promise, in whom the promises to him, concerning his numerous posterity and their extraordinary privileges, should be especially fulfilled. (Notes, iv. 9—17. Heb. vi. 13—17.) In thus adducing the case of Isaac and Ishmael, the apostle certainly did not decide on the eternal state of either of them; yet the subject, which he thus illustrated, namely, a remnant of believers among an unbelieving nation, must refer, not to outward advantages and disadvantages, but to eternal salvation or damnation, for "he that believeth and is baptized shall "be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned." And this is equally clear, whether it be held, that this remnant believed, in consequence of their being elected, or that they were chosen in consequence of their faith, either as foreseen, or as actually exercised.

V. 10—14. As Isaac was Abraham's only son by Sarah his wife, it might have been supposed that the covenanted blessings were limited to him on that account. Yet not only Ishmael, Abraham's son by Hagar the bondwoman, and his children by Keturah, were excluded, but even Esau and his posterity, though the elder son of Isaac and Rebekah, and twin-brother to Jacob. Even before they were born, and consequently before they had done good or evil, it was said to Rebekah that the elder should serve the younger, (Note, Gen. xxv. 22, 23.) which certainly implied the special favour of God to Jacob above Esau, and that the covenanted blessings would be restricted to him. This denoted that the purpose of God, in respect of the heirs of promise, would be established according to the sovereign election of God, who calleth men to partake of the blessing as he pleaseth, and not of any works which they would perform. Doubtless, God foresaw that Esau's works would be profane and evil, and Jacob's in a measure pious and holy; but the latter could only be foreseen as the effect of his election and consequent regeneration, and so they could not be considered as the cause of them. God foresaw them both as born in sin, and he knew, that if they were left to themselves they would continue in sin through life; but, (for reasons best known to himself,) he purposed to change Jacob's heart, and to leave Esau to his native perverseness, because he freely loved Jacob, but did not in the same manner love Esau. Wickedness foreseen is doubtless the cause of the Lord's purpose to condemn, because it is of a man's self by nature; but holiness foreseen in a fallen creature cannot be the cause of his election, because it is the effect of special grace, and never comes from any other source. This instance of Esau and Jacob was intended as an illustration of the divine conduct towards the fallen race of man. It has often been urged, that Jacob and Esau were not so much personally intended, as their posterity, and that temporal, and not eternal, things are spoken of; and this is certainly true. Jacob never had dominion over Esau personally, but his posterity ruled over Esau's. The election, the prediction, the birth-right, and the blessing, however, secured to Jacob and his seed the same religious advantages, as the promise of God secured to Isaac and his seed, and excluded Esau, as well as Ishmael, from them; and this, without determining any thing of Esau's eternal state, though his character, and the epithet profane annexed to his name by the apostle, seem to indicate that he was not a believer; yet it is evident, that the subject illustrated related to individuals, and to their eternal state, whether as believers or unbelievers. As Esau, that "the purpose of God according to election "might stand," had no inheritance in Canaan, and was not the progenitor of Christ, so those Israelites, who did not belong to "the election of grace," were excluded from the true Church, had no part in Christ, and no inheritance in heaven: but the reverse is true of "the "election of grace." They were called, and in consequence believed; they were justified in Christ and glorified, 15 For he saith to Moses, [p] I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I will have compassion.

16 So then [q] it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that sheweth mercy.

17 For [r] the scripture saith unto Pharaoh, [s] Even for this same purpose have [t] I raised thee up, [u] that I might shew my power in thee, and that [x] my name might be declared throughout all the earth.

18 Therefore [y] hath he mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will, [z] he hardeneth.

(Note, viii. 28—31.) and the same is the case in respect of men in all other ages and nations. If indeed there were any of our race, not fallen like other men; or not by nature dead in sin, and children of wrath, even as others; if there were any inclined, without preventing grace, to repent, and to believe the humbling holy Gospel of Christ, to love God and obey his will; then indeed the election might be made with respect to their foreseen faith and obedience. But then what ground would there be for the objections, which the apostle evidently supposes would be made to his doctrine? Or what reason to silence them, in the manner which he afterwards does; when he might easily and consistently with truth have given an answer far more satisfactory to the objectors, by clearly explaining his meaning? It is then inquired, First, Are all men, as born of Adam, equally depraved? and secondly, Is man willing of himself to do what is spiritually good, or does the grace of God make him willing? When these questions are answered, according to the scriptures and the articles of our church, it will readily be perceived, that no good, foreseen either in the hearts or lives of sinners, could be the cause of their election to eternal life. If then God loved Jacob, and hated Esau, (or showed him far less favour,) without reference to their works, as comparatively good or bad, could any injustice be objected to him? By no means; he did Esau no wrong in leaving him to his own choice, and he and his posterity received more favours than they deserved; nor did the unmerited love of God to Jacob and his posterity in any measure injure Esau. Even in respect of holy creatures, we must either allow, that God may justly permit them to sin, and punish them for it, and so at least foreknow both the permission and the punishment; or else we must deny that he can act as a moral Governor of the universe. For if this were not just, God would be bound to prevent all his creatures from sinning; and if they were left to sin, He only would be the cause of it. So that men are not aware what blasphemy is involved in their bold objections on this subject. Much more then may God righteously leave fallen creatures to themselves, to proceed in rebellion, and sink into destruction. He might justly have thus left all; it is of infinite mercy that any are saved; and their salvation can be no injury to those, who are only punished according to the desert of their own sins: and it is probable, that most of the objections brought against these doctrines originate from the want of a deep conviction, that God would have been just, had he left our whole fallen race under final condemnation. The election of nations to special privileges and religious advantages, not vouchsafed to other nations, which some expositors suppose to be here meant, (contrary to the whole tenour of the context,) is liable to the same objections as personal election; and can only be vindicated in the same way. All might justly be left without them; and when some are mercifully favoured with them, "that the purpose of God according to election might stand, not of works, but of him that calleth," no wrong is done to the others.

V. 15—18. 'Mercy pre-supposes misery, and this sin, or the voluntary corruption of the human race; and this corruption pre-supposes a creation in purity and uprightness.' (Beza.) Moses, for whom the Jews professed the highest deference, had written as strong language concerning the sovereignty of God in showing mercy, as the apostle used, when JEHOVAH declared, "I will have mercy on whom I have mercy; and I will have compassion on whom I have compassion:" for the latter clause is in the present time, which implies, that he would by no influence be induced to alter his fixed purpose of showing mercy, or executing vengeance. (Note, Ex. xxxiii. 19.) In the case of Jacob, it indeed appeared, that he was willing to obtain the blessing, and he ran at his mother's word; thus he prevented Esau, and Isaac, contrary to his purpose, blessed him: but the whole transaction was disgraceful, and merited the indignation rather than the favour of God. (Notes, Gen. xxvii.) The establishment, however, of the covenant with him and his posterity did not originate from this, but from the electing love of God; whose purpose respecting him had been made known long before. Thus believers greatly desire the salvation of Christ, and labour to secure it; yet these are streams from the fountain of electing love. They "were by nature children of wrath, even as others: but God, who is rich in mercy, for his great love wherewith he loved them, even when they were dead in sins, hath quickened them together with Christ." Thus he makes them willing by regeneration; and they are disposed to the diligent use of means, and through these they are made partakers of salvation; the sinfulness attending their very diligence being graciously forgiven. Whereas they, who are not thus willing and diligent, are not made unwilling by any positive act of God; but it is the consequence of their own pride, self-will, love of sin, and aversion to holiness; it springs from innate depravity, and is increased and strengthened by habits of disobedience, and can never be removed, except by an act of almighty power, which God cannot be bound in justice to perform for any of his rebellious creatures. Men are indeed naturally willing to be saved from misery and made happy, and are often very diligent in proud and unbelieving endeavours in order to it; but this is widely different from a cordial willingness to be saved from sin as well as misery, and made holy and happy, in the humbling method of the Gospel. This subject was exemplified in the case of Pharaoh. God the Creator advanced him to great authority and prosperity, and spared his life through the several plagues of Egypt; but at the same time he left him to harden himself in enmity and rebellion. This he declared to be intended, that in his destruction he might make known his power and glory throughout the earth. So that it must be allowed, that he hath mercy on such of our apostate race as he sees good; and that he hardeneth whom he will, by leaving them to themselves and under the power of Satan, by ordering his dispensations respecting them in such a manner as he knows will exasperate their enmity and embolden their presumption, and by judicially sentencing them to final obduracy, that his justice in their punishment may become the more conspicuous. (Notes, &c. Ex. iii—xv.) 'This hardening also is voluntary, because the Lord, 'offended by their depravity, makes use of their own will, 'in executing this judgment on those whom he hardens. 'Then follow the fruits of this hardening, namely, unbelief 'and sins, which are the real causes of the condemnation of 'the reprobate.' (Beza.)

V. 19—21. The unhumbled objector would be sure here to cavil, and to inquire, Why the Lord blamed or punished Pharaoh, or indeed any man, for his sins? Who had resisted his sovereign will and appointment? Even they, who most rebel against his precepts, fulfil his decrees; his will is therefore universally done, and no creature makes any opposition to it. As if the secret purpose of God could be a rule of duty to his creatures! Or as if a man could mean to do the will of God, by breaking his express commandments, out of enmity to him, and to gratify his own lusts! To this presumptuous caviller, (and such are very numerous, when both avowed enemies and false friends of these doctrines are included,) the apostle answered, by demanding of him, (a man, a sinner,) who he was, that he should deem himself authorized to reply against God, and to charge him with injustice or want of wisdom, for those things which he had expressly spoken and done? Was it proper for the creature to call his Creator to an account, for having formed him as he saw good? Would not men allow the infinite God the same sovereign right to manage the affairs of the creation, as the potter exercises in disposing of his clay, when of the same lump he makes one vessel to a more honourable, and another to a meaner, use? (Notes, Is. lxiv. 6—8. Jer. xviii. 6—10.) Would they give the Lord no credit for his justice, wisdom, truth, and goodness, when they could not fully comprehend them? Nor infer from his infinite perfection, that he could not do wrong, however it might appear to them? And could there be any danger from the exercise of absolute sovereignty by infinite excellency? Would they dare to dictate to the Lord, to determine what he ought to do, or to call him to an account for what he had done? It is plain, from the whole context, that the apostle did not mean, that God might justly make innocent creatures miserable by prerogative, as some seem at least to suppose; for he goes upon the supposition that the divine sovereignty is that of infinite wisdom, justice, truth, and goodness. The words, "have mercy on whom he "will have mercy," imply that all deserved wrath; so that the lump of clay in the hands of the potter must refer to men, already existing in God's foreknowledge as fallen creatures. But the apostle intended to repress the arrogance of ignorant presumptuous worms, who venture to speak about injustice, cruelty, tyranny, &c. in discoursing of their offended Creator and Judge; who conceive in their own imagination how the infinite God ought to act; and then, forgetting who He is, and who they are, charge him foolishly, and say, that if such and such doctrines be indeed true, then God is—but their words ought not to be repeated. This very common practice is such a compound of arrogance, irreverence, and folly, that it seems the most glaring proof of human depravity, which even this wicked world exhibits; especially when it is added, that many pious men appear, in the violence of controversy, sometimes to be betrayed into it. It is wonderful that the great Mr. Locke should confidently assert, that the apostle here speaks of men nationally, and not personally, in reference to their eternal state, when the rejection of the Jewish nation, with the reservation only of a remnant "ac"cording to the election of grace," was the main subject, to illustrate which all the other examples are introduced. This remnant consisted of a small number of individuals, not of a nation; and the Gentile converts were individuals out of their several nations, forming, with the Jewish converts, the Christian Church; and not whole nations, or one whole nation, chosen, as a collective body, to succeed to the external advantages which the nation of Israel had forfeited: and surely "the vessels of mercy before prepared "unto glory," which the apostle next mentions, must have been chosen, not to external advantages, but to eternal life. (Note, viii. 28—31.)

V. 22, 23. Suppose that God was pleased, (as in the instance of Pharaoh,) in order more conspicuously to display his powerful wrath against his enemies, to endure their provocations with patience for a long time, till they 24 Even us, [n] whom he hath called, [o] not of the Jews only, but also of the Gentiles?

26 And [s] it shall come to pass, that in the place where it was said unto them, Ye are not my people; [t] there shall they be called the children of the living God.

27 [u] Esaias also crieth concerning Israel, [x] Though the number of the children of Israel be as the sand of the sea, [y] a remnant shall be saved:

28 For he will finish the * work, [z] and cut it short [a] in righteousness; because a short work will the Lord make upon the earth.

31 But Israel, which [i] followed after the law of righteousness, [k] hath not attained to the law of righteousness.

32 Wherefore? [l] Because they sought it not by faith, but as it were by the works of the law. For [m] they stumbled at that stumbling-stone:

had acted out the desperate wickedness of their hearts, and filled up the measure of their sins, and so became ripe for signal vengeance; what injustice could there be in this? In allusion to the potter's vessels, they were in themselves vessels of wrath, and their wicked dispositions and actions rendered them fitted for destruction. Nor could they have been preserved from it, but by an act of omnipotent power, as well as by the exercise of unmerited mercy; this God was not bound, and did not see good, to bestow; and they were too proud and wicked to ask, or desire it, or even to accept of it. They despised the riches of that long-suffering that spared them; they treasured up wrath in the impenitency of their hearts; and at length received their due recompense. (ii. 4—6.) And if, on the other hand, the Lord chose to display the abundance of his glorious power, truth, and love, in his dealings with some of the same lump, whom he had selected to be vessels of mercy, what was this to others? They were not any more meet for the felicity intended them than the former; but he was pleased to prepare them before for it, by his converting and sanctifying grace: as well as to make them capable of actively glorifying him here on earth. But did his free love to them imply injustice to others? Their cause for gratitude is immense; but have those, who suffer no more than they deserve, any ground for complaint? while he withholds from none their due, he has surely a right to do what he will with his own. (Notes, Matt. xx. 1—16.) The different language used concerning "the vessels of wrath, and the vessels of "mercy," is of vast importance in stating this doctrine solidly and scripturally; the former are "fitted for de- "struction;" it is not said that God had fitted them. For he saw them, in themselves, both deserving wrath, and fit for the place of torment, and the society of fallen angels; but God himself before prepared the vessels of mercy for that glory to which he intended to advance them. The term, "vessels of mercy," implies, that they too had deserved wrath; and the preparation before-hand for glory, shows that in themselves they had been unprepared. (Notes, Eph. ii. 1—10. Tit. iii. 3—7.)

V. 24—29. The vessels of mercy, or converts to Christianity, had been called forth from among both Jews and Gentiles; this gave great offence to the unbelieving Jews, yet their own prophets had foretold it. Hosea had predicted, that they would be beloved of God as his people, who had not been so; and Isaiah had shown, that but a remnant would be saved from the innumerable multitudes of Israel; and that God would finish his work with that nation, in a righteous but compendious manner; or by taking a short account of the chosen people among them, and consigning the rest to just destruction throughout the whole land. The passages referred to have already been considered; and though the version is somewhat different, being from the Septuagint, yet the meaning is nearly the same. (Notes, Is. i. 7—9. x. 22, 23. Hos. i. 8—10. ii. 21—23.) A seed is here put for "a very small "remnant," in Isaiah; but the twenty-eighth verse considerably differs from the passage, as it stands in the original of the prophecy. 'From comparing the original 'with the Septuagint, no one can deny, that the Greek 'interpreters have in fact rendered the passage very neg- 'ligently, as far as words are concerned. Should any one 'ask, why the apostle nevertheless used that translation, I 'answer, that he did this very properly, because they to 'whom he wrote had been used to that translation; and 'that, as far as the sentiment is concerned, in support of 'which Paul adduced this testimony, the Greek interpreters 'had preserved it sufficiently faithful. Nor does it signify 'any other, either in the Hebrew or the Greek, than that 'God had determined to render the number of an ungrateful 'people extremely small.' (Beza.)

V. 30—33. The apostle, having shown that both the purposes and predictions of God were fulfilled, in the rejection of the unbelieving Jews and the calling of the

CHAP. X.

The apostle again shows his earnest desire of Israel's salvation; testifying to their zeal, stating wherein it was erroneous, and distinguishing between the righteousness of the law and that of faith, 1—11. He maintains that Jews and Gentiles were in this respect on equal terms, 12, 13; that it was proper to preach to all, though many would not believe, 14—18; and that the prophets had foretold the rejection of the Jews and the calling of the Gentiles, 19—21.

Gentiles, here proceeds to show by what means this had been effected, which tended to prove that the Lord had acted righteously, and the Jews wickedly, in this matter. The Gentiles, who before lived in the grossest ignorance, idolatry, and wickedness, without at all inquiring or following after righteousness, had suddenly, through the surprising grace of God, been brought into a state of acceptance with Him, being called to partake of "the "righteousness of God by faith." But Israel, who had the law, which contained the rule of righteousness, and shadowed forth the way of justification, and who had sedulously paid regard to it as "a law of righteousness," had not attained to the righteousness for which they sought. Not living up to their law, they were condemned by it, yet cleaving to it, they rejected Christ and his salvation. Wherefore then had they failed of acceptance? Was it merely through God's decree? Or did he refuse to receive them in the same way as the Gentiles were justified? No, truly; but they refused to seek the blessing by faith, as an unmerited favour, and persisted in claiming it by the law, as a matter of right. This they did, as it were, by the works of the law; they did not think that they perfectly kept the law, but they expected to make up their deficiency in one respect, by abounding in others, or by repentance and amendment, and the legal sacrifices, or by superstitious additions and observing the traditions of men. Thus they sought the blessing from that, which denounced a curse upon them, and refused to trust wholly in Him who was raised up to bless them. At this stumbling stone they fell, as it had been predicted. (Notes, Is. viii. 11—15. xxviii. 16.) Their obstinate pride and unbelief were the immediate cause of their ruin, and God had only decreed, in righteousness, to give them up to the lusts of their own hearts. Some expositors think, that the apostle had reference to a race, in which the Jews, with all their advantages, were so far from coming in before the Gentiles, that they were left far behind; "for the last shall be "first, and the first last." Mr. Locke, and many others, argue, that the apostle only meant, that the Gentiles had embraced the true religion, not that they were brought into a state of salvation; but surely, if they "attained to "righteousness, even the righteousness which is of faith," they were justified persons, children of Abraham, children of God, and heirs of heaven; and though all who professed the Gospel were not of this character, yet none else were partakers of "the righteousness which is of faith." It is also allowed, as these learned expositors maintain, that the dealings of God with the Jews, and not his general conduct towards mankind at large, as to their eternal concerns, is the primary subject of the chapter; but the dispensations of God with Israel are explained, illustrated, and justified, on such principles, as establish in the clearest manner the method of his dealings with mankind at large. And if we are not allowed to infer general conclusions from the commands, testimonies, promises, and dispensations of God, in respect of individuals, it does not appear how we can use the Scriptures, or a great proportion of them at least, either for doctrinal or practical purposes, either for encouragement, warning, or instruction in righteousness. "Whatsoever things were "written aforetime, were written for our learning." "All these things happened unto them for ensamples, and "they are written for our admonition, upon whom the "ends of the world are come. Therefore let him that "thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall." (Rom. xv. 4. 1 Cor. x. 11, 12.) The Jews, as a nation, had outward privileges, so have Christians as a collective body. Most of them trusted in these outward privileges, and rejected the salvation of Christ, and so do the bulk of professed Christians. A remnant, however, believed and were saved, while the rest were hardened and rejected; the case is the same with professed Christians. This remnant was "the election of grace," and so is the remnant of true Christians.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

The command of loving our neighbour as ourselves, and the example of Christ, require us to mourn over obstinate transgressors, especially when near to us according to the flesh; at the same time that we vindicate the justice of God in his dealings with them. This sorrow and heaviness, springing from natural affection, will indeed alloy our present consolations; but they are active principles, exciting us to use proper means for the conversion of those around us, and to submit to hardship, reproach, loss, or suffering, in our compassionate endeavours for their good; and the more such affections rule in our hearts and influence our conduct, the more we resemble Him, who was made a curse for us, to redeem us from the curse of the law. We cannot now know the purposes of God respecting others; it will be soon enough for us to be "without natural affection," when perfected in holiness, and to rejoice in the destruction of his enemies individually, when the event makes them known to us. In the mean time insensibility to the eternal condition of our fellow creatures is contrary both to the love required by the law, and the mercy of the Gospel; and the more we can appeal to our heart-searching Judge, through the testimony of his Spirit in our conscience, that we sincerely pity, pray for, and would suffer any thing to save, our most virulent despisers and persecutors, the greater confidence we may use in affectionately warning them of their danger, and of the delusions into which they are fallen. For no external forms, notions, means, promises, or intercourse with eminent saints, can profit such as have not the power of godliness. Nay, if we stood related to Christ himself, according to the flesh, we should be no better for it, unless we submitted to him, trusted and worshipped, and obeyed him, as "God over all blessed for ever."

V. 9—21.

The whole Scripture shows the difference between the professed Christian and the real believer. Outward privileges are bestowed on many, who are not the children of God. These are born of the Spirit, according to the promise and "purpose of him," who "worketh all things "after the counsel of his own will," and not because they were any better by nature or of themselves than others. For "the Lord hath mercy on whom he pleases "to have mercy," "and it is not of him that willeth, "nor of him that runneth, but of God, that showeth "mercy." Yet is there abundant encouragement to the use of means. The promises, invitations, and exhortations of Scripture are perfectly consistent with the secret purposes of God. Where there is a willing mind, and humble diligence in seeking him, the blessing will certainly be given: and the happy believer will in due time ascribe even this willingness to electing love. But if men wilfully harden themselves in disobedience and impenitence, he will show his power and vengeance in their destruction, and cause all their abused prosperity to increase their condemnation and his own glory in it. Who could have previously thought, that any of our race would have presumed to say, that there is unrighteousness with God! To quarrel with his judgments, and pretend that none hath resisted his will! Shall criminals cite their offended Sovereign to their blasphemous tribunal? If they do, let them see to it, for evil is before them. He that sitteth in heaven will deride their folly, and vex them in his hot displeasure; he will go on with his own plan, exercising his holy sovereignty as he sees good, and distinguishing between those who adore, and those who blaspheme, the depths which they cannot fathom; and he will number with the latter such as pretend to believe the doctrines in question, and then take occasion from them to sin with greater presumption. But surely all who love and fear God, however such truths may dazzle and dismay them, should reverently keep silence before him. And even if they hear them stated unscripturally or licentiously, they should take care what words they use in disputing against those who thus pervert the truth, that they may not appear to countenance the impieties of infidels and ungodly men. In short, modesty, caution, humility, and profound awe of the holy Majesty of God, should restrain and guide the tongues and pens of all, who speak or write on such subjects, however satisfied they may be with their own views of them.

V. 22—33.

Sinners need no preparing for destruction; they are vessels of wrath, and God's long-suffering towards them is very wonderful. But the vessels of mercy were originally of the same lump, and that new creation, by which they are "afore prepared unto glory," is as great a display of the riches of God's grace and mercy, as the inheritance which he freely bestows upon them. If we have experienced something of this change, surely, in our own case, we must allow that the Lord alone hath made us to differ; and, instead of disputing against that free electing love, whence all our happiness flows, we should be employed in adoring his pardoning mercy and new-creating grace, or in giving diligence to make our calling and election sure. And they, who know nothing of this change, ought to be far otherwise employed than in disputing either for or against this doctrine. Let them strive to enter in at the strait gate, before the door be for ever shut, and leave such discussions to those who are walking with God in the way to heaven. As many of us have now obtained mercy, and are the people and children of the living God, who once were far off from him, so we may pray, and use means that this may be the case with others throughout the earth. For, alas! even among the vast number of professing Christians, it is to be feared that but a remnant will be saved, and the Lord will be righteous in the destruction of an immense majority of them. Blessed be his name, that he hath left us also a seed of true believers, to preserve our land from being as Sodom and Gomorrah, yet this will not prevent many individuals from perishing with still deeper destruction. Whilst numbers care for none of these things, and perish through open impiety, and while some are snatched from among them by an unexpected conversion, and pass from death to life, through the righteousness of faith and the grace of the Gospel, others, who seem intent on following after the law of righteousness, attain not to it, "because they seek it not by faith, but, as it were, by the works of the law," by some confused observance of an imaginary rule, and expecting to atone for sin by forms, sacraments, alms, and superstitions, and by some general notion of Christ's making up the rest. At this stumbling-stone how many fall, and lose the race! Being offended at the humbling, levelling doctrines of free grace, they even make the precious foundation for our hope, which God himself hath laid, and on which whoever trusts shall never be ashamed, a Stone of stumbling, and a Rock of offence, and so perish with an aggravated destruction. From such a downfall good Lord deliver us! Amen.

NOTES.

CHAP. X. V. 1—4. Aware of the offence which his doctrine would give the Jews, and even many of the Jewish Christians, the apostle repeated his protestation of his earnest desires and fervent prayers for the salvation of his people, notwithstanding their prejudices against him, and the persecutions which he had endured from them. He was also ready to bear testimony for the Jews, that they had "a zeal of God," or a very great zeal in things relating to God and religion; they were very zealous for the worship of God, according to the law of Moses, as they understood it; but it was with a misguided and ignorant zeal, founded on a misconstruction of the law itself, and of their national covenant, and so leading them fatally to oppose the kingdom and salvation of their promised Messiah. For they, not being acquainted with the perfect justice of the divine character, law, and government, and not understanding the nature of that righteousness, which God had provided for the justification of sinners consistently with his own glory, had gone about by various devices to establish their own righteousness, as the meritorious ground of their justification; in doing which, they had actually refused to acknowledge the justice of God in their condemnation, and to submit to seek righteousness as his free gift by faith alone. The expression, "establish their own righteousness," seems to be taken from a person, who allows his house to be out of repair and in some danger of falling; but will not be convinced that the foundation is destroyed, and that it must come down, and be entirely rebuilt on a new foundation. He therefore endeavours, by props and buttresses, and various repairs, to make the house stand; but all his expense and labour are thrown away; and if he persist in his vain endeavour, it will be likely to fall down and bury him in its ruins. Thus the Jews, (and immense numbers in every age do the same,) when convinced of defects in their moral righteousness, endeavoured to repair them by ceremonial or superstitious observances; nor would they be convinced that they were building upon a false foundation, that they must totally give over such vain and perilous endeavours, and come for a free salvation to Christ, even as the poor Gentiles did. To this they would not submit, because they did not know that Christ was the end and scope of the law for the justification of all believers. The strictness and sanction of the moral law showed men their need of a free salvation, and the ceremonies shadowed forth Christ and his work, as fulfilling the righteousness, and bearing the curse, of the law; so that even under the law, all, who were justified before God, obtained that blessing by faith, which interested them in the perfect righteousness of the promised Redeemer. Some argue, that if the apostle had, in the preceding chapter, meant, that the reprobation of the Jewish nation was absolutely decreed, he would not have prayed for them; but he knew that a remnant was excepted; he did not know to what number this extended, and his good will, (so the original word signifies,) towards them was so strong, that he prayed for the conversion of Israelites, in a way which implied a longing desire that they all might be saved. Had it depended on him, this would have been the case; he prayed according to the knowledge which he had, and left secret things to God, adoring his wisdom and justice, even in those events which were contrary to the feelings and desires of his heart.—The author can answer for one, that the belief of personal election and the divine decrees does not in the least interfere with his joining heartily in that prayer of our excellent liturgy, 'That it may please God to have mercy upon 'all men.'

V. 5—11. Moses had repeatedly stated the righteousness which the law demanded of a man, in order to his justification; (Marg. Ref.) and his description showed, that without a sinless obedience to every precept, no man could be accepted by it, and effectually cut off all transgressors from every hope in this way. But the righteousness of faith might be introduced as using the words of Moses on another occasion. (Note, Deut. xxx. 11—14.) The self-condemned sinner needs not to perplex himself with inquiries, how it could be obtained; he needs not say in his heart, Who shall ascend into heaven, to fetch down one who may introduce such a righteousness? For Christ has already come down, and finished that work. Nor need he inquire who should descend into the grave, or the place of departed spirits, to bring back the crucified Saviour from the dead; for that also was done, and he was exalted at the right hand of the Father, to confer the blessing on all who applied for it. Nor was the information respecting the means of obtaining an interest in it at a distance, that men should travel into far countries to inquire after it; on the contrary, it was nigh to them, in the word of faith which the ministers of Christ were sent to preach; it was in the mouth of all who professed the Gospel, and in the hearts of all that believed it. In short, if a man confessed his belief in Jesus, as the Lord and Saviour of lost sinners, and really believed in his heart that God had raised him again from the dead, in attestation of having accepted his atonement, he should certainly be saved, by the righteousness of Christ imputed to him through faith. For that faith, which interests a sinner in the merits of Christ, has its seat especially in the heart of a humble penitent, and produces cordial desires after him and love to him; and the bold confession of his name and truth among enemies, and in the face of danger, evidences a man's faith to be genuine, and gives a sure hope of complete salvation, according to the prophecy before referred to. (ix. 33.) The distinction, between confessing with the mouth, and believing in the heart, shows that the apostle was discoursing, not of a mere profession of Christianity, but the genuine sincerity of him who made that profession. On the other hand, they who refused to make this open profession, in times of persecution, had little reason to conclude, that in their hearts they truly believed in Christ for righteousness and salvation.

V. 12—17. In respect of the subject spoken of, there was no difference between Jews and Gentiles; for as none of them could be justified by their works, or saved in unbelief, so the infinite Creator and Governor of the world, being rich and plenteous in mercy towards all who humbly call on him for salvation, would never exclude any from justification who believed on his Son. Thus the prophet had foretold, concerning the times of the Messiah, that "whosoever should call on the name of the LORD should "be saved." (Notes, Joel ii. 28—32. Acts ii. 16—21.) The Jews in general called upon JEHOVAH for temporal deliverance and eternal salvation, even while they rejected Christ; but they called in vain; this therefore could not be the intent of the prophecy. By calling on the name of the Lord, we must understand, either invoking the Lord Jesus personally, as the incarnate Word, the co-equal Son of God, "God manifest in the flesh," or calling upon the Father by faith in the Son, and through his intercession; but the former sense best accords to the apostle's argument, and is by far the most obvious construction of the words. All believers thus called on the name of the Lord Jesus, and none else would, that is, humbly and sincerely; therefore all, whether Jews or Gentiles, who thus sought help from him, would be saved. But how should any call on the Lord Jesus, the divine Saviour, who had not believed in him as such? Or how could any believe in him, who had never heard of him or his salvation? Or how could the Gentiles hear the things pertaining to Christ, if none of the Jews, to whom they were immediately revealed, were sent by God and his Church to preach to them? Why then should the Jews blame the apostle and others, for engaging in this needful and benevolent work, to which God had called them? The necessity and importance of preaching the Gospel had been stated in strong terms by the prophet, (Note, Is. lii. 15.) who had poetically described even the feet of those who proclaimed the Gospel of peace to be beautiful; and though the Gentiles had not generally welcomed the salvation of Christ (any more than the Jews,) so as to receive it with an obedient faith, yet that too had been intimated by the same prophet, when he expressed his grief and surprise at men's general inattention to the glad tidings of salvation by a suffering Messiah. (Note, Is. liii 1.) And even the phrase which he used, when he called the Gospel "our report," confirmed the foregoing argument, that faith generally came by men's hearing a report of Christ, brought to them by the faithful preaching of the word of God. This is the means which God hath appointed and chiefly blessed for this purpose, and it is therefore man's duty to use it, in expectation of his blessing. The manner, in which the apostle applies the words to Christ, which Isaiah spake of JEHOVAH, forms a strong proof of our Lord's Deity.

V. 18—21. As, then, the hearing of the report concerning Christ was so necessary to faith in him, could it be said, that the Jews had not had an opportunity of hearing it? Indeed, the Gospel had been so generally and extensively diffused by the ministers of Christ, that the words of David, respecting the instructions conveyed to all nations by the luminaries of heaven, (as typical of the Sun of righteousness,) might be well applied to what had already taken place. (Note, Ps. xix. 4.) But the Jews especially had almost universally heard it. The apostles, the seventy disciples, and others, by the express command of the Lord, preached in the cities and villages of Judea and Galilee, for a long time, before they addressed the Gentiles; and even St. Paul, the apostle of the Gentiles, constantly first preached to the Jews, in every city whither he went. Very few of that nation therefore could plead, that they had had no opportunity of hearing this report; and their unbelief was not the effect of ignorance or want of instruction, but of obstinate enmity against the truth. Again, could the Israelites pretend, that no intimations had been given them, that God intended to cast them off for their unbelief and disobedience, and to take others in their stead? Even Moses, in that prophetical song which all were commanded to learn throughout their generations, had represented Jehovah declaring that he would excite them to jealousy, by those who had been no people to him, and raise their indignation by his favours shown to a nation, which had been despised as foolish, because idolatrous. This had been remarkably accomplished, in the virulent opposition to the Gospel, which the calling of the Gentiles had excited in the Jews; when it should have stirred them up to an emulation, not to be surpassed in faith and holiness by those who had before been so ignorant and far from God. (Note, Deut. xxxii, 21.) Isaiah, also, in very bold language, which must have given very great offence to his contemporaries, had introduced Jehovah declaring that he was found as a Saviour, and acceptably worshipped, by those who just before had not so much as sought for him; and that he had freely bestowed his favour and conferred his special grace on those who had not previously made any inquirers after him; but in respect of Israel, he declared, that he had stretched out his hands full of blessings, and with most earnest and affectionate invitations to disobedient and perverse people. (Note, Is. lxv. 1, 2.) Their voice. (18.) Learned men have shown, that the word rendered in the nineteenth Psalm, "their "line," may signify "their loud voice," as the apostle here quotes it from the Septuagint.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

Faithful ministers bear most affectionate good will to those from whom they receive the greatest injuries; and offer their fervent and persevering prayers for the salvation of the very persons, against whom they denounce the wrath of God, if they persist in unbelief. Not only are careless and shameless profligates, infidels, and blasphemers, in the broad road to destruction, but many also who have a zeal for God and religion; and while we should inculcate earnestness in that important concern, we must also insist upon the absolute necessity of its being regulated by the word of God, without which it can only the more speciously deceive and ruin the souls of men. Sinners could never persist in their vain endeavours to repair the baseless edifice of their own righteousness, if they knew either the justice of God as a Governor, or his righteousness as a Saviour. But being ignorant, through heedlessness, pride, and prejudice, of both the law and the Gospel, they stand out against their partial convictions, they do not allow the justice of the sentence denounced against them, as sinners deserving the wrath of God, and they will not submit to be saved by "the righteousness of faith," in the same way with the vilest of the human species. Manifold are their devices and endeavours to establish a legal righteousness of their own; but all their labour is lost, and their souls continue in the most imminent danger; for in opposition to all other methods of obtaining the divine favour, whether forged by ignorance, superstition, philosophy, enthusiasm, or grave morality, we must still insist upon it, that "Christ is the end of the law for "righteousness to every believer," and that every unbeliever remains under the curse of the law and the wrath of God. If a man object to this, and dispute about the difference between moral and ceremonial obedience, and argue that the former may help to justify a man, though the latter cannot, let him hear Moses describe the righteousness of the law, and then let him inquire whether he can claim eternal life according to it. Let him take the law of God, (for rules that men prescribe to themselves and to each other are out of the question,) and, having produced a sinless obedience to it, through the whole of his continuance here, in thought, word, and deed, let him then demand the reward as a debt. But if this be a desperate attempt; let him submit to the degradation of a condemned criminal, and apply for pardon to the clemency of his offended Lord, and for eternal life, as his free gift through Jesus Christ and by faith in him. The humble trembling sinner has, however, no cause for discouragement. The righteousness of faith, invites him as it were, to accept of it; the Surety hath finished his obedience and atonement, and is risen and exalted to be our all-prevailing Advocate. Nor need we cross the seas, or explore far distant climes in quest of divine knowledge; this is brought nigh to us in the Gospel, and if we receive it by living faith in our hearts, and confess that faith with our mouths in this evil world, without doubt the blessing is ours. But we should not trust in a faith, of which we are afraid or ashamed to make a confession; much less ought we to depend on any mere confession of faith, or assent to divine truths, which we have not believed in our hearts. For no faith is justifying, which is not efficacious in sanctifying the heart, and regulating all its affections in subserviency to the love of Christ. Of such a faith no sinner

CHAP. XI.

The apostle shows, that God had not so cast off Israel, but that a remnant would be saved by grace, not by works, 1—6; while the rest were blinded, as foretold by the prophets, 7—10. He predicts that this rejection would not be final, and states the consequences to the Gentiles, both of the fall of the Jews and of their recovery, 11—15. He cautions the Gentile converts not to boast against the Jews, but humbly to profit by this example of God's severity and goodness; and foretels glorious times which would at length arrive, 16—32. He adores the depths of the divine wisdom, and the glory of his unsearchable judgments, his underived all-sufficiency, and his universal sovereignty, 33—36.

I SAY then, [a] Hath God cast away his people? [b] God forbid. [c] For I also am an Israelite, of the seed of Abraham, of the tribe of Benjamin.

2 God hath not cast away his people [d] which he foreknew. [e] Wot ye not what the scripture saith * of Elias? how he [f] maketh intercession to God against Israel, saying,

3 Lord, [g] they have killed thy prophets, and [h] digged down thine altars; and I am left alone, and they seek my life.

4 But what saith the answer of God unto him? [i] I have reserved to myself seven thousand men, who have not bowed the knee to the image of [k] Baal.

5 Even so then [l] at this present time also there is a remnant, according to the [m] election of grace.

6 And [n] if by grace, then is it no more of works: otherwise grace is no more grace. But if it be of works, then is it no more grace: otherwise work is no more work.

V. 12—21.

In the great concerns of eternal salvation there is now no difference between one nation and another; for our rich and gracious Lord most willingly regards the desires of all who call upon him, and none receive the less, because of the numbers who share the blessings with them. As therefore faith, (whence all true prayer proceeds,) comes by hearing the word of God, we should be careful to be found among those who obey the Gospel, and we should zealously and diligently endeavour to communicate the same blessing to others, even to the ends of the earth, with all the influence which we have, that the Sun of righteousness may diffuse his healing beams, wherever the sun in the firmament gives light to mankind. When we hear of the success of the Gospel among the ignorant, the barbarous, or the profligate, instead of being displeased, as proud Pharisees are, we should cordially adore the riches and power of the grace of God, in his being thus found of them who sought him not; and we should excite ourselves and each other to a holy jealousy and increasing diligence, lest we should be left behind by those who once were so far below us in spiritual advantages. Thus we shall obtain the assurance, that we are not of that immense number, to whom the Lord says, "All day long have I stretched "out my hands to a disobedient and gainsaying people."

NOTES.

CHAP. XI. V. 1—6. The apostle next supposes that it would be inquired, whether God had utterly cast away his chosen people, and so failed of performing his promises to their Fathers. This inference from his doctrine he decidedly disavowed. Indeed, the Lord could not so properly be said to have cast them off, as they to have cast him off, by their determined opposition to the kingdom and salvation of the promised Messiah, by which they of course forfeited their privileges. This appeared from the ready reception with which all met, who were willing to become the disciples of Christ; of this St. Paul himself was a most remarkable instance, for, being a descendant of Abraham, and notwithstanding his furious persecution of the Church, he was now become the apostle of Christ to the Gentiles. God had not therefore cast away his people, whom he had foreknown as in due time to be called and justified, to whom especially his promises had respect: though he had left the rest to fall by their unbelief. (Note, viii. 28—31.) But as a considerable remnant was reserved to the Lord in the days of Elijah, when the prophet was ready to conclude that he alone was left to serve him, and used such words in prayer, as might be considered as pleading against Israel, (Notes, 1 Kings xix. 10—14.) even so there was a remnant reserved of many ten thousand Jews, yea, a far greater proportion than was generally supposed, at that very period when the nation was cast off from being the people of God. This remnant was reserved "according "to the election of grace;" not because they were less undeserving of such favour than others, but because God was pleased to have mercy on them for reasons best known to himself; otherwise they too would have perished in unbelief. If then this election were of grace, it could no more be pretended to be of works, either performed or foreseen, as this would imply that something naturally in the objects chosen determined the Lord's preference, and that it did not originate in his mere grace. For if, in any sense or degree, it were of works, it would in part at least

7 [o] What then? [p] Israel hath not obtained that which he seeketh for; [q] but the election hath obtained it, [r] and the rest were * blinded,

10 Let [a] their eyes be darkened, that they may not see, [b] and bow down their back alway.

11 I say then, [c] Have they stumbled that they should fall? God forbid: [d] but rather through their fall salvation is come unto the Gentiles, [e] for to provoke them to jealousy.

be of debt, and not of entire free favour; otherwise work, as it stands related to election and justification, would lose its very nature. For an entire free favour must be absolutely distinct from a reward, conferred in consequence of some work performed; as the price of one farthing, paid for what is worth a thousand pounds, must in exact propriety of speech essentially distinguish it from an entirely free gift. This text is so decisive on the subject, that great pains have been taken to explain it away; but really the arguments of the most able and learned men on the other side, prove nothing so much as the weakness of their cause. I shall therefore only observe, in general, that in fact they are not called, who to our apprehension are best disposed to perform good works, but often the contrary, as the examples recorded in Scripture alone undeniably demonstrate; that every real good disposition in an apostate creature must be the effect, and cannot therefore be the cause, of the grace of God bestowed on him; that God did not act without reason in choosing one rather than another, though we are not made acquainted with his reasons; and that the display of the infinite riches of his mercy, the omnipotence of his grace, and the glory of his own sovereignty, in converting the most unlikely persons in the world, are far more probable reasons of his choice, than any foreseen comparative goodness of natural disposition in those who are saved, above those that perish. "The "election of grace." (5.) 'Not those who chose grace, 'but those whom grace chose; that is, those whom God 'freely chose.' 'Neither would grace be grace, if we 'were in the smallest degree chosen for our foreseen good 'works; nor would work be work, if in any measure it 'needed the help of grace.' (Beza.) (Note, iv. 4, 5.)

V. 7—10. What then was the precise state of the Jewish nation? In general, they had not obtained that justification unto life which they sought for, because they clave to their own devices, and rejected the Gospel of God; but "the election," or the chosen remnant among them, had obtained it, whilst the rest were blinded; so that the rejection of the latter was the punishment of their own sins; but the calling of the former was neither the consequence, nor reward, of their own works. The election here mentioned, as distinct from Israel, God's chosen people, (that is, an election within an election,) clearly marks the difference between a collective choice of a people to special external privileges, and a personal choice of individuals to eternal life; and it fully refutes the sentiments of those, who would confine all these scriptures to the former kind of election, because they know not what else to do with them. This judicial blindness of the enemies of Christ had been clearly foretold, and might therefore have been previously expected. (Notes, Deut. xxix. 4. Ps. lxix. 22—28. Is. vi. 9, 10. xxix. 9—12.) These scriptures have already been explained in this sense; but we may add, upon the version here given of David's words, that the provision made for the souls of the Jews, (as well as their temporal plenty,) were, in righteous judgment, made the occasion of their being more deeply ensnared in guilt, and sinking under more dreadful condemnation, as the recompense of their unbelief; till at length they were totally blinded, and given up as slaves to the oppression of their enemies, to be bowed down continually with the heavy burdens laid upon them; an emblem of their base and ruinous bondage to sin and Satan. The apostle seems rather to have given the sense of several prophecies to this effect, than the exact words from the Septuagint, or the literal translation from the Hebrew. God hath given, &c. (8.) 'This by no means implies, that God infuses any 'new viciousness; but that he, as a just Judge, delivers 'up those, who are destitute of grace, unto Satan and 'to their own lusts, to be more and more blinded.' (Beza.) This venerable reformer certainly adopts what is generally called the supralapsarian doctrine; and ventures on expressions, which few modern Calvinists, (as they are called,) would subscribe; yet he by no means admits those consequences, which numbers, who speak evil of what they understand not, indiscriminately charge on all who hold the doctrine of personal election to eternal life.

V. 11—15. The apostle next inquired whether the nation had so stumbled, as finally to be excluded from all further share in the blessings covenanted to their fathers; or whether God had no further end in that mysterious dispensation, than merely their fall and ruin. He would by no means admit either of these suppositions; for it actually appeared, that the Lord intended through the fall of the Jews to communicate his salvation to the Gentiles. The persecution of the Christians in Judea drove them into other regions; and the Jews, in every place rejecting the Gospel, excited the preachers more speedily and openly to address the Gentiles; by which means vast multitudes had been turned from idols to serve the living God. Yet even this was suited to excite the Jews to a holy jealousy, and an emulation with the Gentile worshippers, in zeal for the service of JEHOVAH, and earnestness in seeking the blessings of the Messiah's kingdom; though it too generally had the contrary effect, through their pride and bigoted prejudices. If then their fall had been over-ruled for the enriching of the world in general with the blessings of the Gospel; if the diminution of the numbers of that long-favoured people, by the expulsion of so large a part of them from the visible Church, and the subsequent judgments inflicted on them, was the occasion of communicating such rich blessings to immense numbers of the benighted Gentiles, how much more would their conversion, when the whole nation should in one full body acknowledge and submit to their long despised Messiah? For this they have ever since been preserved a distinct people, almost by a continued miracle; and as their conversion will probably be effected by the fulfilment of other prophecies, so it is likely that it will conduce to the conversion of the nations in general. For Paul, addressing himself to the Gentile converts, (though he was aware that both the Jewish Christians and the unconverted Jews would read his argument,) spake in the character of the apostle of the Gentiles by the special designation of Christ, and aimed to commend and magnify that office, as honourable to himself, (though he was vilified for it,) and most important for the good of mankind. At the same time, by a most judicious and delicate turn, he represented his zeal for the conversion of the Gentiles as animated by the desire of stirring up his brethren the Jews, whom he regarded as his own flesh, to emulate their faith and aspire to their privileges; that thus he might be instrumental in saving some of them also, though he knew that the sentence denounced upon the nation was irreversible. The English word provoke, being now fixed in common use to the idea of exciting indignation, is very apt to confuse the reader's mind, and to prevent his clearly seeing that the apostle spoke of exciting them to holy, and not to unholy, passions; though the latter was generally the effect of his conduct, contrary to his intentions. As therefore the righteous rejection of the unbelieving Jews had proved the occasion of such multitudes of the Gentiles, throughout the world, being reconciled to God and walking at peace with him; what would their future reception into the Church introduce, but such a change as would resemble a general resurrection of the dead in sin to a life of righteousness, in every part of the world; and a proportionable increase of spiritual life to all who before had believed? This event will accomplish so many prophecies in so open and signal a manner, that infidelity in every form must be finally confuted and silenced; and the attention of the most heedless must be excited to the astonishing display of God's power in performing his word; and as he delighteth in mercy, he will effectually concur with these impressions, by pouring out his Holy Spirit to convert the nations, and to render genuine Christianity universally triumphant.

V. 16—21. The apostle here speaks of Israel as the visible Church of God, the repository of his oracles and ordinances; the vineyard which he had enclosed and planted, but which he was now about to leave desolate and exposed. The attentive reader will readily perceive, that relative holiness, or consecration to God, is here exclusively meant. The first fruits of the dough, being presented to God, sanctified, as it were, the whole lump to the use of his people; thus the patriarchs, the first-fruits of Israel, being chosen and set apart, with their seed after them, as a holy people to the Lord through all their generations, a measure of this relative sanctity attached to their posterity, notwithstanding their rebellions and visitations; in consequence of which, all their males were circumcised on the eighth day, as the professed people and worshippers of JEHOVAH. But another similitude still more aptly illustrated this subject; if the root of the tree were holy, the branches must be supposed to be the same. Now Abraham was, as it were, the root of the visible Church in all subsequent ages. After Ishmael and the sons of Keturah had been broken off, the tree grew up in Isaac; then Esau being broken off, it shot forth abundance of branches in Jacob and his twelve sons. When any Gentiles were proselyted, they were grafted into this tree by circumcision, as long as the legal dispensation lasted; (but by baptism after the Christian dispensation entered;) and they with their posterity were from that time considered as branches

22 Behold [g] therefore the goodness and severity of God: on them which fell, severity; but toward thee, goodness, [h] if thou continue in his goodness: [i] otherwise thou also shalt be cut off.

23 And they also, [k] if they abide not still in unbelief, shall be graffed in: for God is able to graft them in again.

24 For if [l] thou wert cut out of the olive-tree which is wild by nature, and wert graffed contrary to nature into a good olive-tree: how much more shall these, which be the natural branches, be graffed into their own olive-tree!

of the tree, a part of the visible Church as springing from Abraham. Notwithstanding all former rebellions, the Jews were the branches of this tree, till as a nation they rejected the Messiah; (though the most of the ten tribes had before been broken off;) but after that, their relation to Abraham and to God, was, as it were, suspended; they were broken off from the olive-tree in vast multitudes; they were cast out of the Church, as the children of the bond-woman, or as profane Esau; neither they nor their posterity any longer retained even the outward seal of the covenant; (for circumcision lost its validity, and baptism became the sign of regeneration;) and they were thenceforth deprived of the ordinances of God. At the same time the Gentiles were grafted into this tree in their room; by professing faith in Christ, and being baptized into his name, they were admitted into the visible Church of God, and attained a relative holiness; they were favoured with the means of grace, and the ordinances of God, "for their good, and "that of their children after them," as the Jews formerly had been; and multitudes, that had been the branches of the wild unfruitful olive-tree, were thus made heirs of Abraham's faith, holiness, and blessedness. Yet the Gentile Christians ought by no means to copy the Jews, in being proud of their distinction, or in boasting over those who had been rejected to make room for them. But if any of them were disposed to do this, they should recollect, that they were not the root of this well-cultured fruitful tree; nor had they naturally sprung from it, but of free grace had been grafted in to share its advantages. Abraham's race had derived no spiritual good from them; but they derived all from Abraham's race. They might indeed say that the natural branches had been broken off to make way for them, and it was indeed true that God had preferred them; yet it was not on account of their works, but of mere grace. Through unbelief, the offspring of pride, the Jews had been broken off, and through faith the Gentiles had been grafted in; they ought therefore to beware of self-confidence, self-preference, and every kind of pride or ambition, lest, having only a dead faith, and an empty profession, they should apostatize from God and forfeit their privileges. For if he had not spared the natural branches, they ought surely to fear lest they too should be broken off. This doubtless refers to the collective body of professing Christians, and not to individual believers; the latter are indeed preserved through humility and holy fear, yet there is no real danger of their being cut off. It has also a peculiar prophetic energy, when we consider it as addressed to the Roman Church, which, so soon attempting to domineer over other Churches, to be the metropolis of the Christian world, and at length to be infallible, fell, through pride and presumption, till it became "the mother of harlots, and of abominations of "the earth." It is obvious to observe, that, though the illustration of grafting excellently suited the apostle's purpose, yet the reverse takes place in the case before us, than in natural grafting; for there, the good Cion communicates its changing efficacy to the wild stock; here, the good stock imparts its efficacy to the corrupt branches, which by divine power are grafted into it. The apostle's reasoning in this place strongly evinces the oneness of the visible Church under every dispensation; and the change of the initiatory ordinance since the coming of Christ is manifest; his statement therefore implies more substantial arguments in favour of infant-baptism, than has generally been supposed. 'We ought indeed to glory in God; 'but not so as to despise the Jews, whom it becomes us 'rather to excite to a holy emulation. And they doubt'less do suffer, and will suffer, the punishment of this 'neglected duty, who at this day call themselves Chris'tians, and yet, impelled only by their own wickedness 'and perverseness of mind, by all means vex that holy 'people, (as it respects their fathers;) and also harden 'them more and more, by setting before them the ex'amples of the basest and most insane attachment to 'idols. But, indeed, I would daily and most willingly 'thus pray for the Jews: O Lord Jesus, thou indeed justly 'avengest the contempt of thyself, and that ungrateful 'people is worthy of thy severest judgments; but, O Lord, 'remember thy covenant, and pity them for thy name's 'sake. And grant unto us, the most unworthy of all 'men, whom nevertheless thou hast distinguished by 'thy mercy, that, making proficiency in thy grace, we 'may not be the instruments of thine anger against them; 'but that rather, both by the knowledge of thy word, and 'by the example of a holy life, we may, through the 'power of thy Spirit, recall them into the right way; that 'thou mayest be glorified for ever by all nations and 'people. Amen.' (Beza.)

V. 22—24. Instead of boasting over the rejected Jews, or glorying in themselves, the Gentile converts should contemplate with wonder, awe, and gratitude, the unmerited goodness, and righteous severity, of the Lord; on the fallen Jews severity, but to themselves most astonishing goodness. Yet, considering them as professors of Christianity, concerning whom there was no absolute demonstration that they were all true believers, it was proper to add, "if ye continue in that goodness;" that is, if in humble faith they received and lived upon the grace displayed in the Gospel. But if any of them, either personally or collectively, were unbelieving and presumptuous, and renounced the truth, they too would be cut off. Whereas, if the Jews were not obstinate in their unbelief, they would be grafted in again, which might be easily accomplished by the divine power. For if God had taken the Gentiles, as branches of the wild olive-tree, the descendants of those who for so many ages had been ignorant and licentious idolaters, and had, by his word and Spirit, grafted them in among his own people and worshippers; doubtless he would much more in due time graft the Jews, the natural branches, into their own Olive-Tree. This was spoken prophetically, both respecting the apostacy of the Roman Church, and the future conversion of the Jews. 'This "grafting in again," 'seems to import, 'that the Jews shall be a flourishing nation again, professing Christianity in the land of promise; for that 'is to be reinstated again in the promise made to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. This St. Paul might, for good 'reasons, be withheld from speaking out here; but in 'the prophets there are very plain intimations of it.' (Locke.)

V. 25—32. Perhaps the apostle was aware, that the mystery of iniquity already wrought in the Church at Rome, (2 Thes. ii. 7.) and therefore he laboured the more to check its fatal progress. He would not have them ignorant of the mysterious purposes of God respecting his ancient people, lest their present distinction should render them proud of their own wisdom. The Lord, in his righteous sovereignty, had permitted blindness in part to happen even to Israel; not a partial, but a total blindness; but it extended only to a part of the nation, for the election was preserved from it. This would continue to be the case till the happy period arrived, for the conversion of the fulness of the Gentiles. In the intermediate ages vast numbers of them would be gathered into the Church; but about the time of the last great harvest of the nations, the blindness will be removed from Israel, and the nation saved from its rejected dispersed state, and be brought in a body to embrace the Gospel; probably it will be restored to the holy land, and most of the Jews at least will become true believers. This accords to a prophecy, which, as here quoted, not materially differing from the original in Isaiah, predicts the spiritual coming of Christ, to turn away from the Jewish nation ungodliness, impenitence, unbelief, and enmity to his kingdom and salvation; that, by thus removing the guilt and power of their sins, his covenant may again be ratified with them. (Note, Is. lix. 20, 21.) For though in respect of their rejection of the Gospel, and their indignation at its being preached to the Gentiles, they were considered as enemies to God, which was over-ruled for the calling of the Gentiles, through special love to them; yet in regard to the original election of that people in Abraham, and the immense number of elect persons, that are yet to spring from them, they are still to be favoured, for the sake of their pious fathers; seeing God will, in his persevering love and kindness to that race through all ages, show, that however he is said to repent of his threatenings and judgments, and is thus better than his word, yet he never repents, or is said to repent, of his special gifts, or distinguished favours, bestowed on, or promised to, fallen man. So that as the Gentiles, who had once no knowledge of God, had at length obtained mercy, through the unbelief of the Jews, and by means of their preachers, even so the unbelieving Jews might at length obtain mercy, through the mercy shown to the Gentiles, and receive the Gospel from them in their turn. For God had alternately left both of them in unbelief, shut up as in a prison, for the appointed time, in order that at length he might have mercy upon them all, by bringing both Jews and Gentiles and all nations to the knowledge of his salvation, by faith in Jesus Christ.

V. 33—36. 'The apostle breaks forth in this exclamation, as filled with astonishment at the exceedingly

CHAP. XII.

The apostle exhorts Christians by the mercies of God, to be devoted to him, and conformed to his holy will, 1, 2; to think humbly and soberly of themselves, as members of one body in Christ, 3—5; to exercise faithfully their different gifts, and perform the duties of their several stations for the common benefit, 6—8; to mutual love, diligence, patience, hope, prayer, hospitality, compassion, and condescension, 9—16; to a peaceable, forgiving, and becoming conduct towards all men, and to a persevering kindness to enemies, 17—21.

'admirable wisdom of God, which he also thus teaches 'should be piously and reverently adored, and not profanely and curiously searched into beyond the boundaries 'of revelation.' (Beza.) He had gone as far in unravelling, illustrating, and vindicating the mysterious designs of God, as was proper or profitable; yet he well knew that much darkness and difficulty must still rest on them, and that presumption, pride, and unbelief, would still multiply inquiries and objections. Thus he gave no countenance, either to those who, with absurd arrogance, pretend to reduce all possible existence, truth, and knowledge, to the size of their own intellect, and to believe no more than they can comprehend, or to those who know no end of speculating and disputing, and of arguing from revealed truths to their unrevealed causes and consequences, as they suppose them to be. Instead of this he closed the subject, by breaking forth into admiration and adoration of the unfathomable depth, and infinite treasures, of the wisdom and knowledge of God. His views are immense and eternal, and his reasons for every part of his vast designs are taken from himself, and his purpose of glorifying his own perfections; to us therefore they must be impenetrable and inexplicable, but they are all consistent with the riches, or infinite abundance, of his justice, truth, and love. His judgments and determinations, and his wisdom in them, cannot be fully investigated or comprehended by any created being, much less by us sinful worms. His dealings with his creatures cannot be traced out, for they are a vast deep, where his footsteps cannot be known. We should then be satisfied to understand, and receive by faith, the information which he graciously reveals; and to believe that he acts with perfect wisdom, justice, truth, and goodness, when we cannot comprehend what he is doing; or when his dispensations seem to us not reconcileable to these his essential perfections. This must be the duty of created intelligences; for what being hath an intuitive acquaintance with the mind of the great Creator, that he should be able to discover his unrevealed designs? Or who can pretend, that he hath counselled the Most High, and therefore understands his intentions, and can unravel his decrees? Or who hath first given any thing to the Lord, or rendered him any service, previous to his having received so much from him, as to be bound by the strongest obligations to devote his all to him? If any can prove that the Lord is thus indebted to him, he shall certainly be recompensed: but all such claims, and all men's disputations against his decrees, dispensations, truths, and precepts, involve in them the most irrational arrogance and horrible blasphemy. For of Him, as the self-existent, all-sufficient, and eternal Fountain of being and perfection, all creatures were originally derived: by and through Him they all subsist, are provided for, and disposed of, and to Him they all are, or ought to be, wholly devoted, and in one way or other they all shall proclaim, or display, the glory of his perfections, and the honour of his great name. Instead therefore of murmuring and objecting, all men should, and all believers will, most cordially say, "To "Him be glory for ever, Amen."

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10.

God never casts away those whom he hath foreknown and predestinated to be conformed to the image of his Son; and if this seal be affixed to our souls, we may be assured of his everlasting favour. We may also cheerfully hope, that he hath reserved for himself a larger proportion of such persons in the worst of times, than fall under our cognizance, or comport with any of our computations; and instead of reviling, or making intercession against, the multitudes of worthless professors of Christianity, with whom we are surrounded, we should still hope and pray, that "a remnant, according to the election of grace," may yet be gathered from among them. For as our salvation originates wholly from the free grace of God, without any respect to our works, so we may expect to see that grace abound, in the conversion of the chief of sinners of every description. But though grace must have the whole glory of our salvation, yet sinners perish for their own wickedness; and they who seek the favour of God in unauthorized ways, will never obtain it. Numbers are thus left to be blinded, and given up to the spirit of slumber and to presumptuous confidence; till all their advantages ensnare and harden them, and bind them fast in the bondage of Satan; and it is only by the mercy of God, that any of us are preserved from these strong delusions, which might justly have been awarded us as the recompense of our pride and ungodliness.

V. 11—15.

The Lord over-rules the fall and ruin of some, to the salvation of others. His awful judgments on daring transgressors frequently warn their companions or neighbours to flee from the wrath to come; and, on the other hand, the conversion of notorious sinners sometimes excites others to inquire after him. But what extensive, permanent, and most glorious effects may be produced, in the whole creation of God, through eternal ages, by the fall of angels and men; by our redemption in Christ, and by the dispensations of God towards his Church and the world, we cannot tell. However, a hint of this, a glimpse as it were, into the invisible world, should remind us, that the Lord may have ten thousand wise and gracious reasons for his most severe and terrible judgments, of which we can form no conception. Thus the fall of the Jews was the occasion of the Gentiles being enriched with the unsearchable treasures of Christ; and his justice, truth, and wisdom, were glorified in that awful dispensation; yet their eyes were so blinded, that they could see no glory in it. We, the ministers of the Gospel, however mean and unworthy in ourselves, should magnify our office, as tending unspeakably more to enrich and bless mankind, (provided it be faithfully executed,) then all arts, sciences, commerce, or improvements whatsoever, unitedly can do. Whilst we labour for the conversion of those among whom we are called to minister, we should have an eye also to others, and even to those who are most prejudiced against us, if by any means we can excite them to emulation, or do any thing to save some of them, for they too are our own flesh. Though the Lord over-rules his works of judgment, to the reconciling of sinners to himself, yet he most delighteth in mercy; and he will ere long display his glorious power, by making the salvation of one people the introduction to that of others, till it shall be as life from the dead to all the nations of the earth.

V. 16—24.

While we wait and pray for the approaching happy times to the Church, let us be thankful for our engrafting, as branches of the wild olive-tree, into the holy tree of God's Church, to partake of the root and fatness of it, that the blessing of Abraham might come on us Gentiles by faith. But let the state of those who were the natural branches of this tree, warn us not to rest in external profession or advantages; not to boast, or prefer ourselves to others, or indulge carnal security. If we stand at all, it is "by faith;" this implies that we are guilty, polluted, and helpless, in ourselves; and warns us to be humble, watchful, and afraid of deceiving ourselves, or of being overcome by temptation. Alas, how hath the once flourishing church of Rome fallen, by neglecting the apostle's caution! And how many other churches, and individuals, have, in a measure, trodden the same path! But blessed are they who fear always, and walk humbly with God; who contemplate, with holy awe and fervent gratitude, the severity and the goodness of the Lord, as revealed in his word, and displayed in his providence; who are thus led to "be sober, and to "watch unto prayer;" who, by living faith, "continue in "his goodness," and wait for its complete effect in their eternal salvation. But if any presume themselves to be the peculiar people of God, and despise others, though themselves strangers to his new-creating grace, they will at length be cut off, and cast as unfruitful branches into the fire; while such as have been most estranged from the truth will find admission to all the privileges of the Gospel, if they abide not in unbelief.

V. 25—36.

As pride is the genuine offspring of ignorance, so a spiritual knowledge of the mysterious truths and dispensations of God will tend to prevent our being "wise in our "own conceits." His dealings with his creatures appear very different, when viewed in detached parts, from what they will do, when seen as constituting a most glorious whole. Zion's great Deliverer saves none from wrath, but those who are separated from ungodliness; for his covenant with his people ensures their sanctification, as well as their justification. His "gifts and calling are without re-"pentance," in respect of his true Church; this he hath shadowed forth in his dealings with Israel as a nation. Their captivities, dispersions, and exclusion from the Church, are emblems of the believer's corrections, and rebukes for his transgressions; and the continued favour of the Lord towards that people, and the final mercy intended for them, denote the persevering patience, and victorious love of God to those whom he hath "chosen in Christ "before the foundation of the world," and will finally save for his sake. As we therefore have obtained mercy, through the unbelief of the Jews, let us pray, and use proper means as we can, that through our mercy they may speedily obtain mercy; (Notes, Hos. i. ii. iii.) instead of perplexing our minds about secret things, let us walk in the light which the Lord hath graciously afforded us; and, conscious of our inability to comprehend his deep designs, let us adore the riches of his wisdom and knowledge, whose judgments are not to be investigated, nor his ways traced out, whose mind none can penetrate or comprehend, who needs and regards no counsellor, who first gives life and all things to every one, and to whom none can render any thing which he hath not first received from him. "For "of Him, and through Him, and to Him, are all things, "to whom be glory for ever, Amen." (Dan. iv. 34—37.)

NOTES.

CHAP. XII. V. 1. The apostle having closed the doctrinal and argumentative part of his epistle, (which is so carefully guarded as to be of a very practical tendency,) proceeds here to enforce more particularly a variety of important duties from evangelical principles. He entreated or exhorted the Romans, as his brethren in Christ, in the most earnest and affectionate manner, by the mercies which God had shown to them in their election, redemption, conversion, and abundant privileges, that they would evidence the sincerity of their love, and honour the Gospel, by presenting themselves as a living sacrifice unto him. The allusion seems to be made to the living animals, which were presented as sacrifices before the altar, that they might be slain, and thus offered to God upon it. Thus Christians should present their bodies before God, to be employed in his service, and to be spent and worn out by hardships or labours for him, that so they might be wholly devoted to his glory. The body, with its members, senses, and organs, is the instrument of the carnal mind, in executing its purposes and gratifying its evil inclinations; when therefore the mind is made spiritual, the body should, in like manner, execute its holy purposes, and express its spiritual affections. (Notes, vi. 12—16. Marg. Ref.) Thus the soul becomes the consecrated priest, and the body the living sacrifice unto God, through Jesus Christ. In general this sacrifice must be presented alive, to be employed in the worship and work of God, though sometimes at length it must also be offered up to death by martyrdom. As the legal sacrifices, (which that of Christ had now superseded,) were to be without spot or blemish, so the bodies of believers must be separated from the practice of all iniquity, or they cannot be fit to be living sacrifices to God; but, being sanctified by the Holy Spirit, the worship and obedience performed by them, as the instruments of the renewed soul, are far more pleasing and honourable to God, than legal sacrifices could be. This is a reasonable service and worship, suited to rational creatures, and to their relations and obligations to God, as redeemed sinners; whereas the oblation of bulls and goats, when separated from its typical meaning, was not, in this sense, a reasonable service.

V. 2. In thus wholly dedicating themselves to the service of the Lord, Christians must go entirely against the course of this evil world, and incur the censure, ridicule, and enmity of ungodly men, which would greatly interfere with their worldly interests. They must not therefore seek happiness from the world, or conform to the maxims, customs, and fashions of mankind in general. They must not comply with common usages, as to their pursuits or employments, in any respect, where such usages were contrary to the holy commands of God, the spirit of the Gospel, the interests of piety, and prosperity of their own souls, and the improvement of their talents. In all these things the reproach of singularity is honourable, the want of it suspicious, and to be fashionable is to be unchristian. A serious regard to this rule, and a few others of a similar nature, would soon show men, in what things they "must not be conformed to this world;" and it would easily convince them, that, on the one hand, affected singularity, in things minute or indifferent, comes far short of the spirituality of the exhortation; and on the other, that they excuse their vain amusements, splendid decorations, expensive feastings, eager pursuit of wealth, power, or distinction, waste of time, and other parts of their conduct, because they love the friendship of the world, savour earthly things, and cannot endure self-denial, or the cross; not because they can fairly prove that the maxims and customs of the world in these respects are so agreeable to the spirit of the Gospel, that they may safely conform to them. In order to escape these and other snares, the apostle called on the Christians at Rome "to be transformed by the renewing of their mind." (Marg. Ref.) This transformation of the soul into the holy image of Christ, this daily renovation of the judgment and affections by the power of the Holy Spirit, is the only effectual cure of "conformity to this world," because it produces conformity to "the spirits of just men made perfect," and a capacity for delighting in such society and employments, as most resemble the inhabitants, worship, and joys of heaven. Animated, urgent, and affectionate exhortations to seek this inward transformation, as essential to duty and happiness, are the appointed means of leading Christians to plead the promises, and attend on the ordinances, of God, in order to attain unto it more and more. Thus they prove, or make trial of, and experience the happiness to be found in obeying the salutary, excellent, and holy will of God, made known in his spiritual law, and now enforced by the blessed Gospel; they manifest their cordial approbation of it, and show to others its excellency and beneficial tendency. This alone can be an acceptable service to God, being perfect in its own nature, and suited to the perfecting of the soul in holiness, and then the body will indeed be presented as a living sacrifice unto him. There does not appear in these verses any distinction intended between the Jewish and Gentile converts; or any reason to conclude, as some have done, that the Gentiles were especially addressed. The customs and practices of the unbelieving Jews were as little to be conformed to by the Christians, as those of the heathen were; and the case is the same in respect of a vast majority, in countries called Christian. This world. 'Thus he calls the 'state of unregenerate men, without any exception." (Beza.) The Jews were no longer required to offer the legal sacrifices, the Gentiles must renounce their idolatrous sacrifices, and were not required to keep the ritual law; but both were bound to devote themselves to God in holy obedience.

V. 3—5. The preceding general exhortation was in the affectionate style of brotherly love, but this is in that of apostolical authority. According to the distinguishing favour shown to him in his call to be the apostle of the Gentiles, St. Paul charged the Romans to beware of spiritual pride, to which their distinguished situation might peculiarly expose them. (xi. 20. 25.) Let no one of them, however eminent for rank, abilities, learning, or spiritual gifts, think more highly of himself, than consisted with the truth of his case and character, as a lost sinner saved by sovereign grace. Let none forget the Giver of his peculiar distinctions, the end for which they were bestowed, and the improvement required of them. Let none over-rate his own talents, as if they entitled him to superiority over others, or authorized his emulation or ambition. But let every one soberly and prudently estimate his own gifts and attainments, according as the Lord had dispensed to every man his proportion of faith, and the benefits connected with it; that he might neither bury his talent in the earth, as undervaluing it, nor yet grow proud of it, or above the duties of his proper station in the Church, or disposed to aspire after those places for which he was not qualified, or to envy and oppose such as filled them. In short, every one of them ought to be in the Church, as the members are in the human body, where each is fitted for its place, and as it were contented in it, and there quietly performs its proper function, for the good of the whole. Thus united unto Christ our Head, animated by one Spirit, and endued with different gifts, Christians are the members of one mystical body, and should seek its welfare, in humble diligence, disinterested love, and unambitious quietness. (Notes, 1 Cor. xii. 12—31.) Think more highly, &c. (3.) 'That he be not 'immoderately pleased with himself, as proud and ambi'tious persons are, who seem to themselves more wise 'than they really are.' (Gr.) 'It behooves every one— 'to be conscious of those gifts, which he has received of 'the Lord, that he may perform his duty with a good 'conscience. But there are two boundaries, within which 'the sobriety and moderation, required by the apostle, 'are included. The one, that we arrogate nothing to our'selves which we do not possess; the other, that we do 'not glory in what we have received, but use them as 'gifts, conferred on us, with trembling, to the glory of 'God.' (Beza.) The measure of faith. It is commonly observed that faith is here put for those spiritual gifts, which were generally conferred on believers, and exercised in proportion to the measure of their faith. Yet it is evident, that in some instances even miraculous powers were possessed by those who had not saving faith. (Notes, Matt. vii. 21—23. xvii. 19—21. xxi. 20—22. Marg. Ref.) 'For πιστεως (faith) in one manuscript we find χαριτος' (grace.) (Beza.)

V. 6—8. As God, the Giver of every good gift, had imparted to each of them abilities, providential advantages, spiritual gifts, miraculous powers, or qualifications, for that office in the Church to which he had been called, and as none had any claim upon God for the least of these benefits, which he had an undoubted right to bestow in that measure and proportion he saw good, as an act of mere grace and favour, so every one ought to be satisfied in his place, and with his work, and ability to perform it. If any one therefore were endued with the gift of prophecy, and was enabled either to foretel future events, to deliver any message from God, or to explain his word for the edification of the Church, let him exercise this gift, according to his ability, which would be in proportion to the degree of faith by which he depended on the teaching of the Holy Spirit; or, (as some explain it,) let him show himself to be truly inspired, by speaking in entire consistency with the analogy of faith, or that system of divine truth, which God had made known to his Church by his prophets and apostles. If a man were called to the office of a deacon, in receiving and dispensing the charities of believers among the poor, the sick, the prisoners, or others; or in any other way to minister to the common benefit, by managing the concerns of the Church; let him faithfully, diligently, and steadfastly attend to that good work, and serve Christ and his brethren in it. If any man were called to teach young persons or new converts the first principles of Christianity, or to instruct others in the truth and will of God, let him give himself up to the duties of that station, well satisfied with his work, and let him neither envy his superiors, nor despise those beneath him. If another were called to the higher functions of the pastoral office, by authoritatively counselling, encouraging, exhorting, admonishing, instructing, or reproving his fellow Christians, let him be chiefly concerned to fulfil his ministry in a proper manner, and to give himself to it, as the great business and pleasure of his life. He who, having this world's goods, was enabled to serve the common cause, and to provide for his needy brethren, let him do it liberally without covetousness, and in simplicity without ostentation, or assuming authority on that account, but with a single design of glorifying God by doing good to men. He also, who was called to exercise authority, either in the Church over any description of its ministers, or in any magistracy or presidency in the community, let him deem himself advanced, not for his own honour, but for the good of others, and let him accordingly employ himself diligently, in the performance of his proper duty. And finally, in whatever way any one might be called to exercise compassion, or to alleviate misery, let him do it with cheerfulness, notwithstanding the expense, hardship, danger, or disgusting circumstances, to which it might expose him, counting it his happiness by any means to be useful. I am aware, that these verses are commonly explained exclusively of the different orders of church officers and rulers, and so every man endeavours to find his own system of ecclesiastical polity in them; but though the various duties of the ministry in all its parts are principally intended, there seems to be no proof that the apostle meant them restrictively. He seems rather to have inculcated a general improvement of every man's talents, for the common benefit of the Church, whatever his gifts and place were. And as there were saints in Cesar's household soon after, so it is possible that Christians might be called to the lower functions of the magistracy. The epistle, however, was intended by the Holy Ghost for the edification of the Church in all ages, so it may be supposed that the duties of Christian magistrates, as well as those of Church-rulers, are hinted at in the general language used by the apostle. Some consider the word rendered ministry, (7.) to be a general term for the different orders of ministers in the Church, which are afterwards enumerated: but the disjunctive particle or, seems unfavourable to that interpretation; the original word may point out the office of the primitive deacons, but the exhortation to "give with simplicity," or liberality, appears more properly addressed to those who distributed their own property, than to the deacons who were intrusted with the treasures of the Church, and to whom, faithfulness, prudence, and impartiality, were especially necessary. Gifts. (6.) Many seem to think that spiritual or miraculous gifts are exclusively intended by this word; but the office of a minister, of whatever order, is itself a distinct thing from a man's qualifications for it; other endowments were even then necessary to the due performance of the ministerial duties, even more so than supernatural gifts; and the money, which some distributed, whether their own or the Church's, was a talent of entirely another nature, yet all were the free gifts of God, and as such to be received and improved.

V. 9—13. The apostle next exhorted the Christians at Rome to see to it, that their professed love of each other was sincere, and free from that dissimulation, that unmeaning and deceitful compliment, with which the world abounded, notwithstanding its selfishness. This hollow show of affection, the counterfeit of genuine love, they ought by all means to avoid, and to be cordial, faithful, liberal, compassionate, forgiving, and kind, in their whole temper and conduct. Depending on divine grace, they must also learn habitually to detest and dread all kinds of evil, and to love and delight in every thing good, kind, excellent, or useful, and to cleave constantly to it, whatever opposition or temptation they met with. By a kind of natural affection for their brethren in Christ, the effect of regeneration and progressive sanctification, they should delight in every exercise of mutual love; and, in deep humility, and a disposition to animadvert on their own faults, and to notice the gifts and graces of others, they should learn to prefer and honour one another, and to yield the respect and precedency to others which ambitious men claim to themselves, and readily to honour, and induce others to honour, the estimable conduct of their brethren, who, on one account or another, were disregarded or discouraged. Whatever business any of them were called to, they ought to avoid all slothfulness, and to do it in a skilful, diligent, and assiduous manner, from love to Christ and zeal for the honour of the Gospel, with fervency of spirit, as serving the Lord in their most ordinary employments. This would ennoble every business, and render it acceptable to God, and it would redound to the credit of the Gospel, if every Christian acquitted himself better in the business which he undertook, than other men did. They were called on to rejoice in the hope of that glorious inheritance, which the promise of God ensured to them; and thus to bear up under their various trials with submission, constancy, cheerfulness, and meekness. And as they could do none of these things of themselves, they ought to persist in constant earnest prayers, notwithstanding all the discouragements which they would feel, and the temptations they would meet with, to render them slack in that duty. Not only ought the wealthy, but all of them according to their ability, to distribute to the necessity of their poorer brethren, and hospitably to entertain in their houses such as were driven out by persecution, or came as strangers from other cities, or were in any way destitute, trusting in God to provide for the expense thus incurred. Given to, &c. Or, Pursuing hospitality. (Heb. xii. 14. 1 Pet. iii. 11. Gr.) 'Stay not till occasions 'of this kind force themselves upon you, and much less till 'importunity extort the favour; but, like Abraham, look 'out for proper objects of such a bounty, and follow after 'them, to bring them back to your houses.' V. 14—16. With this kindness to their friends, they must admit of no resentment against their enemies, but should wish well to and pray for their persecutors and all men, and never allow themselves to utter bad wishes or imprecations against any one. Instead of grudging or envying the prosperity of their brethren or neighbours, they ought benevolently and unfeignedly to rejoice with them, as well as to sympathize with, and endeavour to comfort, those who mourned. Thus they all ought to be united in one mind and affection, and to judge themselves interested in the welfare of every individual of the body to which they were joined. Nor ought they to covet, value, or aspire to high things, such as wealth, honourable connexions, preferments, reputation; but be satisfied to associate with men of low estate, or to stoop to mean and low accommodations, being contentedly poor, or condescendingly and benevolently rich. And especially, they should avoid all conceit of their own wisdom, as if they were above ordinary rules, had no occasion to ask wisdom of God, or to regard the counsel of their brethren; or as if they ought to be at the head of every business, and nothing could be well done if they were not consulted about it. The marginal references form by far the best comment on the comprehensive and sententious practical hints, of which the latter part of this chapter consists.

V. 17—21. The preceding exhortations had principally respected the behaviour of Christians one toward another; but these mainly relate to their conduct among their unconverted neighbours. No provocation ought ever to induce them to render evil for evil to any man, however vile his character were. In every part of their conduct, and in all their dealings, they ought to study and endeavour, that uprightness, punctuality, sincerity, and fidelity, might evidently appear in them, in the sight of their most severe judges. By the most harmless and forbearing conduct, and by every sacrifice and concession, they ought, if possible, to avoid all quarrels and litigations, and to live at peace among their most unreasonable and injurious neighbours; avoiding all contention, as the greatest evil to their own souls, and to the cause of true religion, except it were a meek, but steadfast, contention for the truth. When they were insulted, defrauded, or assaulted, even if no redress could be obtained from the magistrate, they must not on any account presume to avenge themselves, but rather give way to the wrath of their enemies, and without opposition endure the effects of it; or as some interpret it, they should give place, and leave it to God, whose wrath they had incurred, to punish them, if he saw good, as private persons must give place, and leave the punishment of those who had robbed or assaulted them to the magistrate, remembering, that God had declared that vengeance belonged to him; so that when an unauthorized person presumed to avenge himself, he invaded God's prerogative, and, as it were, attempted to wrest his sword of justice out of his hand. (Note, Deut. xxxii. 35.) On the contrary, they ought to wait for the opportunity of their enemy being in distress, in order kindly to supply his wants and alleviate his sufferings, as a man would feed, and give drink to a weary, wounded, fainting traveller. In doing this, they would use the proper method for melting down his obdurate heart into reciprocal affection; like the founder, who not only puts fire under the hard piece of metal, but heaps fire over it also, that by fire on every side it may at length be melted. (Notes, Prov. xxv. 21, 22.) In this contest of love against hatred, they should persevere with a fixed determination not to yield, or to be overcome by any degree or number of injuries, or by any ingratitude or ill usage, so as to give way to resentment, or to cease from embracing the opportunity of returning kindness; but with a holy pertinacity to persist in the endeavours of overcoming evil with good, after the example of the Lord towards them. (Notes, &c. Matt. v. 38—41. Luke vi. 27—35.) ‘ He is overcome of evil, who sins in his conduct to another, because the other sinned in his conduct towards ‘ him.’ Heap coals, &c. (20.) ‘ I believe the sense is ‘ rather this, that if he persevere in his enmity after these ‘ kind offices, thou, by thy patience, shalt engage the ‘ wrath of God to fall upon him, and to maintain thy cause ‘ against him. So Prov. xx. 22, “ Say not thou, I “ will recompense evil; but wait on the Lord, and he “ shall save thee.” ‘ This is the import of the phrase in ‘ the Old Testament, where alone it occurs.’ (Ps. cxl. 9, 10. Is. xlvii. 14. Ez. x. 2. Sept. 2 Esdras, xvi. 52.) (Whitby.) Those commentators, who argue that this cannot be the meaning, for that would be ‘ applying ‘ to revenge, and building upon it,’ while it is expressly forbidden, seem not to have duly adverted to some other parts even of the New Testament. (Luke xviii. 7, 8. 2 Thes. i. 5—9. Rev. vi. 9, 10. xvi. 5—7. xviii. 20.) To expect that God will avenge himself on those who injure us out of hatred to him, and are not won over by any kindness shown to them, is very different from avenging ourselves: and it is evident, that, in some cases, to desire that God would deliver his servants by taking vengeance on their persecutors, or to rejoice when this is done, is not an unholy passion. At the same time it is asserting far too much to say, that in all cases, (or in any case without the special grace of God,) our kindness will melt down our obdurate enemies. On the other hand, Dr. Whitby too readily takes it for granted, that in the passage in Proverbs, which the apostle quotes, coals of fire mean the vengeance of God, and one text at least he has overlooked, in which that expression is used of the intense fervour and great strength of love. (Cant. viii. 6, 7.) Upon the whole, it appears to me, that both interpretations may stand. The line of our duty is clearly marked out; and if our enemies are not melted down by persevering kindness, they will be consumed by the fiery wrath of the God to whom vengeance belongeth. (Notes, 1 Sam. xxiv. 8—15. xxv. 39. xxvi. 8—12. Prov. xx. 22.)

The apostle strongly inculcates subjection to rulers, the payment of tribute, and rendering to all their dues, 1—7. He exhorts to love of each other, as the fulfilment of the second table of the law, 8—10; and in the near prospect of complete salvation, to put away all the works of darkness, and to seek in all things to be conformed to the Lord Jesus, 11—14.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

Surely they strangely misunderstand the doctrines which the apostle teaches, who suppose them inconsistent with exhortations, and instruction in the particular duties of Christianity, or as inimical to the practice of them! The same inspired writer, who most fully established, and most earnestly argues for, the doctrines of grace, is also most exact and particular in exhorting Christians to their various duties. They, who seem afraid that his doctrines may tend to licentiousness, will be equally averse to the impracticable strictness of his precepts; and many, who pretend to be zealous friends to the former, are apt to quarrel with the latter as legal, when echoed by the faithful preachers of the Gospel. But the mercies of God, apprehended by faith and experienced in the heart, form the grand motive to all willing obedience. The love of Christ, abounding in our souls, will cause us earnestly to desire, that our bodies also, (the work of his creating power, and the purchase of his redeeming blood,) should be presented to him as a living sacrifice, that he may be magnified in and by them, whether by the actions and sufferings of a devoted holy life, or by laying them down for his sake, which is in every respect our reasonable service. May we then, with a willing mind, bring them to be washed, and consecrated to the Lord, as instruments of righteousness unto him! The transformation of the soul by the renewing of the Holy Ghost, produces so holy a judgment and taste, and such heavenly affections, that it will readily show us, in what respects we must avoid conformity to the world, and it will lead us to an equal distance from useless singularities, and timid, carnal, and dishonourable compliances. But if the world possess, or have a large share in the heart, some excuse will be invented for indulging the favourite inclination. Experience alone can show us, how good and pleasant the acceptable and perfect will of the Lord is; so that the more we refuse conformity to a vain and wicked world, that we may walk with God in his holy ways, the more indifferent we shall grow to the former, and the greater delight we shall take in the latter. Every avenue of the soul should be guarded against pride; and repeated warnings on this subject are needful to all men, especially to those who are in any respect conspicuous. If indeed, we soberly estimated our endowments, and compared them with our deserts, if we duly consider from whom, and for what, we have received them, and how far we have come short of a proper improvement of them, then they would all tend to our humiliation, as well as the increase of our gratitude, and thus we might know and improve our talents, and yet be covered with shame for not having better improved them. But we are apt to shine in our own eyes, and "to "think of ourselves more highly than we ought to think;" and this leads us to neglect the glory of God, and our duty as members of the Body of Christ, and to indulge emulation, ambition, contests for precedency, contempt of others, and discontent with our own proper place and work. Let us then watch and pray against this evil, and whatever our gifts, or situation may be, let us endeavour to occupy with our talent, humbly, diligently, cheerfully, and in simplicity, not seeking our own credit, or profit, but the good of many.

V. 9—16.

It is our duty, and should be our constant endeavour, from undissembled love, to exceed in evident benevolence, kindness, and courteousness, all those appearances, which polite selfishness assumes, and to be really as ready to oblige and be serviceable, as worldly people profess to be. Thus abhorring all evil, cleaving to all good, and delighting in every exercise of brotherly love, being in our element when contributing to the comfort of others, and habitually ready "in honour to prefer others to ourselves," we shall "adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour," and it will appear amiable in the eyes of those with whom we live. While religion cuts the sinews of that selfish activity which keeps the world in motion, it supplies its place by still more efficacious principles; love to God and man, with zeal for the honour of the Gospel, will influence the intelligent Christian to be diligent in his worldly business, and in acquiring superior skill, that in it he may serve the Lord with fervency of spirit. The joyful hope also of heavenly felicity will better support him in his labours and trials, and endue his soul with more patient constancy, than the expectation of worldly riches or distinctions can do their deluded votaries; whilst by instant continuance in prayer he will find his hope confirmed, and his alacrity in duty revived from time to time. Thus cheerfully dispensing of his gains or earnings to the necessities of his brethren, using hospitality without grudging, blessing and wishing well even to his worst enemies, and feeling no malice against any man, sharing the joy of the prosperous, and sympathizing with the sorrowful, being of one mind and heart with all the children of his heavenly Father, not aspiring to high things in this world, but condescending (if sinful worms can be said to condescend) to men of low estate, and not thinking any honest employment beneath him, or any provision too mean for him, he may pass safely, comfortably, and usefully, through life, and be habitually prepared for a better world.

V. 17—21.

Regard to the honour of the Gospel, and love to mankind, will dispose the zealous Christian, as far as he can, to provide things honest and creditable in the sight of others, to live peaceably if possible with all men, to bear injuries without retaliation or eager resistance, committing his cause to God, to whom vengeance belongeth, to pity and relieve the miseries of his persecutors or enemies, and to endeavour by persevering kindness to convert them into friends; as the love of Christ and his own experience cannot fail to supply motives for persisting in this only contest, and render him ambitious of the most honourable of all victories, even that of "overcoming evil with good." And what now is this, but a few particulars of the holy law of love expounded and enforced by evangelical principles? Yet if our eternal state were to be determined, even in respect of the most conscientious part of our lives, according to the obedience which we have paid to them, or our failure in them, even Sinai's fire and thunder would not be so tremendous as such a judgment. But if, as redeemed sinners, justified in Christ Jesus, we are called to obey these beautiful precepts by his grace, and for the honour of his name, while his blood still cleanses away our daily stains, we then see them to be kind monitors, to show us in what manner we may prove the sincerity of our love, enjoy the foretastes of heaven, be blessings to all around us, and maturing for the employment and felicity of angels. And if all, who contend for the doctrines of grace, were thus "a peculiar people zealous of "good works," the Gospel would appear in its genuine simple beauty, and all would be put to "shame, that falsely "accused our good conversation in Christ."

NOTES.

CHAP. XIII. V. 1. Proceeding affectionately to exhort the Christians at Rome, "by the mercies of God," the apostle next called on them "to be subject to the "higher powers." The Jews entertained various scruples on the lawfulness of obeying heathen magistrates, and this gave occasion to many turbulent spirits to excite scandalous and ruinous insurrection; and the same spirit might creep in among Christians, to the great disgrace of it, as in latter times ecclesiastics, especially in the Church of Rome, claimed the most exorbitant exemptions in this particular. The apostle therefore used the most decisive language on this subject; "every soul," or person, whether a Jewish or a Gentile convert, private Christian or minister, or however distinguished by miraculous gifts, or by his station in the Church, was absolutely required to be subject to the authority and edicts of those who held authority in the state, that is, in all things lawful. The higher powers at Rome were not only heathen, but oppressive, and even persecuting powers, and Nero, who was then emperor, was a monster of cruelty, caprice, and wickedness, perhaps unparalleled in the annals of mankind; yet no exception was made on that account. Christians were to look above such concerns, and to consider God as the Source of all power, and civil government as his appointment for the benefit of mankind; the several forms of government, prevailing in different places, were to be regarded as the effect of his superintending providence, and the persons raised to authority as his deputies. It was therefore incumbent on all Christians to render a prompt and quiet obedience to those governors, under whom their lot was cast, patiently submitting to the hardships, and thankfully receiving the benefits, thence resulting, without objecting to the vices of the constitution, the administration, or the rulers, as an excuse for refusing subjection. It is evident that the apostle did not mean to determine the divine right of absolute monarchy, or exclusively of any form of government, but to inculcate subjection to the ruling powers of every place and time, in which believers lived. But as the benefits of civil government are many and great, and it is the appointment of God for maintaining order among the apostate race of men; so any man, who set himself to oppose the established government of that nation in which he lived, would be considered as resisting the providence, and rebelling against the authority, of God, who gave the rulers their authority, and will himself call them to account for the use which they make of it.—'All other governments derived their power from God, as 'well as that of the Jews, though they had not the whole 'frame of their government immediately from him, as 'the Jews had.' 'Whether we take powers here, in the 'abstract, for political authority, or in the concrete, for 'the persons actually exercising political power and 'jurisdiction, the sense will be the same.' 'How men 'come by a rightful title to this power, or who has this 'title, the apostle is wholly silent, and says nothing of. 'To have meddled with that would have been to decide of 'civil rights, contrary to the design and business of the 'Gospel, and the example of our Saviour, who refused 'meddling in such cases with this decisive question, "Who made me a Judge or a Divider over you?" (Locke.) The words, rendered "the powers that be," or "the "existing authorities," seem intended to exclude all such inquiries. Whatever be the form of the existing government, or the way by which it was established, while it continues to exist, it must be regarded and submitted to as the appointment of Providence. Perhaps nothing involves greater difficulties, in very many instances, than to ascertain to whom, either individually or collectively, the authority justly belongs, or, in fact, what constitutes a lawful title to authority. If then the most learned and intelligent men find many difficulties, and differ widely in their opinions respecting this subject, how shall the bulk of the people be able to decide it? And if Christians are first to determine concerning the right, by which their rulers possess and exercise authority before they think themselves bound to obedience, they must very commonly indeed be engaged in opposition to "the existing authorities." But the apostle's design was to mark out the plain path of duty to Christians, however circumstanced. 'The resistance which consists—in refusal to yield actual obedience to the law of the superior, can only be allowed when the matter of the law is sinful, and so forbidden by the higher Power; not when it is judged inexpedient or unprofitable only; for of this subjects are not to judge, but the lawgiver only. They lawfully may, and therefore, to avoid scandal and punishment, and from respect to him who is God's vicegerent, ought to obey, even as servants ought to obey their froward masters, and children their parents, in all things lawful, and this from conscience towards God. No resistance of the higher powers by force can be allowed to any who have not the power of the sword. For he that thus uses it, takes the sword without authority from him to whom belongeth vengeance;—and so without authority from Him to whom the power of the sword originally belongs. Where a people have conferred—a government according to the law, they must be supposed to have reserved to themselves a power necessary to preserve their laws.' (Whitby.) Thus, in mixed governments, there are legal and constitutional methods, by which the encroachments of one part of the government upon the rights of the others may be resisted. But Christians, in private stations, have not much concern in this; and complicated cases may possibly arise, in which no previous rules or counsels can give adequate direction. Submission in all things lawful to the existing authorities is our duty at all times and in all cases; though in civil convulsions, and amid great revolutions and sudden changes in government, there may sometimes for a season be a difficulty, in determining which are to be considered as the existing authorities. To claim the protection of the law against the illegal violence, even of magistrates, is not "resisting the powers that be." (Notes, Acts xvi. 35—40.) The word, rendered damnation, properly signifies judgment; and is by many expositors explained exclusively of the punishment inflicted by the magistrate; but the apostle is speaking of our duty to God in obeying magistrates, which, if we neglect, he will call us to account for it, and finally condemn us, except we repent. Some have urged against the interpretation here given, that, if this be indeed the rule of our religion, it lays it open to the charge of abetting tyranny, and being inimical to civil liberty. But I apprehend that this is not the case; for all the crimes committed by usurpers, tyrants and oppressors, are at least as severely condemned in Scripture, as those committed by rebels and traitors. Now a religion cannot justly be regarded as abetting tyranny, or as inimical to civil liberty, which denounces the severest vengeance on those who act tyrannically, and unjustly deprive men of liberty. The apostle was not writing a treatise on politics, but teaching a company of private Christians their duty. Had he been called on by Nero, or any other oppressive ruler, as he was by Felix, he would doubtless have "reasoned with him of righteousness—and a judgment to come;" and had he been sent immediately by God to rulers, as the prophets were, he would doubtless have plainly told them their duty, and protested against particular instances of their tyranny and oppression, in the "spirit and power of Elijah," and of John Baptist, when he said to Herod, concerning Herodias, "It is not lawful for thee to have her." But it should be considered, on the other hand, whether the charge of being seditious and "hurtful to kings and provinces," has not in every age been brought against the zealous worshippers of God? (Notes, Ezra iv.) Whether this has not been, and is not at this day, the main pretext of persecutors, and of those who would exclude the preachers of the Gospel out of their several districts? And whether the necessity, which is laid on Christians "to obey God rather than man," is not, in many cases, likely enough to exasperate the spirit of haughty princes, without openly avowing that there are other cases in which we are not bound to obey them? Cases, which in fact call their right to authority in question, and directly impeach their wisdom and justice. Surely this is suited to increase that jealousy against the ministers, missionaries, and professors of the Gospel, in the minds of rulers in all parts of the world, which to this day forms one grand barrier to the propagation of Christianity. A barrier insurmountable, except by the power of God. Had the primitive Christians explained the apostle's doctrine with so many exceptions and limitations as numbers do at present, and acted accordingly, and had Christianity assumed that political aspect which it has generally borne in later ages, (as arising from the circumstances of the times;) nothing but a constant succession of miracles could have prevented its extirpation by the rage of its numerous persecutors. But, in this respect, the apostles and primitive ministers and Christians, and their successors for some ages, when situated "as lambs amidst wolves," were, indeed, "wise as serpents and harmless as doves."

V. 3—5. 'In this way God preserves the good and restrains the bad: by this sentence the magistrates themselves are admonished of their duties to their subjects.'

6 For, for this cause [n] pay ye tribute also: for they are God's ministers, [o] attending continually upon this very thing.

(Beza.) In the general course of human affairs, rulers are not a terror to honest, quiet, and good subjects, but to depredators and malefactors; and on the whole, the benefits of government, even when in many instances it is oppressive, far more than counterbalance its evils. So that they, who would be free from terror in this respect, should live honest and inoffensive lives; and then they will commonly be countenanced, protected, and even commended by their rulers, and may look on them as the ministers of Providence for their good, in defending their persons, property, and habitations, from the violence of wicked men. On the other hand, the evil doer ought to be afraid; for the magistrate does not bear the sword of justice in vain, but as the minister of God's providential government of the world, as a revenger, by his authority, to punish those who violate the peace of the community; so that it is absolutely necessary for men to submit to the authority of the magistrate, not only from fear of his indignation, but also for conscience' sake towards God. If the ruler abuse his authority, God will call him to an account for it: there are legal and constitutional checks upon those who want to introduce tyranny; and on great occasions the people will sometimes, with one consent, arise against a cruel oppressor, and subvert his government; (as the Romans did against Nero, who was condemned by the senate to die, as an enemy to mankind, with the approbation of the whole world:) but Christians seldom need take any active or leading part in such transactions. If laws be unreasonably formed, or iniquitously executed, this should be endured as a cross laid on them, till they, who are legally authorized, apply a remedy to the evil; and if we be required by human authority to sin against God, we must steadfastly refuse obedience, and cheerfully and meekly endure the consequence, well satisfied with the blessing pronounced on those who suffer for righteousness' sake.

V. 6, 7. For similar reasons it is the duty of Christians to pay taxes also; as the advantages of government are great, so must its expenses be very large. Rulers are the ministers of Providence, who are called to attend constantly to this very thing. It is proper, and even for the good of the community, that they, their families and attendants, should appear in dignity and splendour: they are and ought to be taken from the highest ranks in the community, as the temptations of such situations must generally be irresistibly strong to those who have been educated in comparative indigence. Both governors and governed are fallen creatures, and therefore selfishness can by no method whatever be excluded. Some excess of expenditure, some improper accumulation of treasure, some waste of it in providing for relatives and dependents, may be expected, though not excused. Taxes must therefore be imposed, and ought to be scrupulously paid. Sometimes they will be oppressive or very heavy; but this grievance should be patiently endured till it be constitutionally redressed. So that the Christian must render to rulers the tribute, custom, excise or impost, demanded legally from him, with as much exactness as he would pay any other debt. He must use no collusion or fraud: he should not hesitate or murmur; and all smuggling or dealing in contraband goods, all withholding or evading duties imposed on any commodity, and every species of this kind of imposition, is a direct rebellion against the providence and most express commandment of God; and, however such conduct may be palliated or varnished over, it is not merely a defalcation of the revenue, but it is a robbery of all who pay taxes; for such collusions will not prevent the sum required from being raised upon the public; so that when one tax falls short, another is imposed; and when he, who should pay five pounds, pays but three, his more conscientious neighbour must pay seven instead of five, and is therefore directly robbed of forty shillings. At the same time, all the atrocious crimes of the whole body of smugglers, and others who combine to defraud the revenue, are abetted by every one who puts his hand to such a dishonest business. In such a case, to declaim about the vices and extravagancies of rulers, is to add one sin to another. These things never were worse than in the days of Nero: they are inseparable from human nature: the great Lawgiver was aware of them when he gave the commandment; and if no man pay a tax till the character and administration of all concerned in managing public business, and the disposal of the public money, and the tax itself, met his full approbation, nothing would ever be paid by the selfish and unreasonable part of the community, and the public exigencies could never be answered. This subject is the more enlarged on, because the arguments and examples of some avaricious professors of the Gospel draw in well meaning people to wound their consciences, and disgrace the cause, by evading or refusing taxes in a disingenuous and fraudulent manner, which is as contrary to simple truth as to common honesty. Moreover, the apostle enjoins Christians to render fear, or reverence and honour, to those to whom they belong, on account of their authority, rank, or any other civil distinction; neither supposing that religion requires a stiff and rude singularity, in refusing customary titles or expressions of honour and respect to superiors, or that it allows that petulance and scurrility with which many delight to vilify the characters and conduct of their rulers, and those in high stations. Their faults should in general be regarded with candour and silence; (for their situation is conspicuous, and their temptations are very great:) and though the honour due to their rank and authority may consist with disapprobation of their conduct, yet not with reviling and defamation of them. The same authority, which commands children to honour their parents, commands subjects to honour their rulers; and they should honour them in the same manner. (Note, Ex. xx. 12.)

9 For this, [t] Thou shalt not commit adultery, Thou shalt not kill, Thou shalt not steal, Thou shalt not bear false witness, [u] Thou shalt not covet; and if there be any other commandment, it is briefly comprehended in this saying, namely, [x] Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.

V. 8—10. It cannot be supposed that the apostle meant to prohibit the contracting of debts on any account, which is next to impossible to the greatest part of mankind; but only to direct Christians to pay all legal demands, without needless reluctance and delay, and with great punctuality; and that they should avoid all superfluous expense, that they might be preserved from debt, and from the danger and discredit of not rendering to all their dues. Yet when all such demands were answered, they would still owe love to all men, with all the duties that result from its enlarged exercise. The learned Erasmus long since remarked, that the clause might as properly be rendered, "Ye do owe no man any thing, but to love one another:" and though subsequent commentators, almost without exception, take the words imperatively, yet it may be worthy of consideration, whether the indicative construction does not more simply and evidently accord to the context. The apostle was exhorting Christians to render to all their dues: and, having branched out the general precept into a few particulars, he closes by adding, "Ye "owe no man any thing, &c." as if he had said; 'All 'that I would inculcate is reducible to this, obey the law 'of love to others, in all its branches, and then you will 'render to all their dues.' The sense in this construction is obvious and important: but the ordinary interpretation, seeming at least to forbid Christians to contract any debts, and to condemn such as cannot at present discharge those already contracted, may embarrass the minds of the most upright, and requires some management in expounding it, so as to prevent this embarrassment. No doubt, it is the duty of all Christians to avoid contracting debts, which they have not a reasonable prospect of discharging punctually; and to submit to any inconveniency in order to pay their debts in a creditable manner: but the obvious interpretation of the text, as imperative, seems inconsistent with the situation of almost all men in the present state of the world. The usual exposition of the next clause, "but to love one another;" 'Be not a debtor 'to any man of aught but love and affection, which ye 'ought so to pay, as that ye should have more to pay,' (Bp. Hall;) is not to me, at least, very satisfactory: for why should we be allowed so to come short in rendering love to whom love is due, as to be always there in arrears, and there only? If we daily rendered all that love to our neighbour, which is due to him, we should not remain in his debt. The next day would indeed require a fresh payment, but there would be no arrears due. Upon the whole, therefore, though I would speak with caution and hesitation, I cannot but prefer the indicative construction; "Ye do owe," &c. In short, the whole of what the apostle would inculcate was, the exercise of love in its various branches: so that he who loved another, actually fulfilled the law, in respect of its requirements towards his neighbour: and this love of our neighbour as ourselves, in obedience to the command of God, would also be the best evidence of our loving him with all our hearts, according to the first and great commandment of the law. (Notes, &c. Ex. xx. Lev. xix. 18. Deut. vi. 5.) The apostle, by thus appealing to the moral law, as the standard of duty, after having so fully shown that no man can be justified by it, completely establishes the distinction between the law as a covenant, and the law as a rule; and proves that our deliverance from it, in the former sense, is in order that we might obey it in the latter. Worketh no evil, &c. 'Not 'that the law is exactly fulfilled by doing no evil to our 'neighbour: but, because, in Christ's interpretation, the 'neglect of doing any good we are able, and have opportunity to do for him, is doing evil. "Charity is also "kind," 'and engageth us "by love to serve one another." (Whitby.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 11—14. Some think that the apostle here refers to the approaching destruction of Jerusalem, and the more complete establishment of Christianity that followed: but he seems rather to speak of the state of believers in this world, and their expectation of approaching complete salvation. It behooved them to consider how long they had heard and professed the Gospel; and the shortness of the time that might yet remain to them, in which to glorify God among men. Thus they would perceive, that it was full time for them to shake off all remaining sloth and supineness, and to attend to every duty with increasing zeal and vigour, as the day of salvation approached continually, and was then actually much nearer than when they had first believed in Christ; and consequently their term of remaining usefulness on earth was proportionably abridged. The redemption by which salvation comes to lost sinners, was finished with the humiliation of the Saviour, and when he expired on the cross. Salvation becomes ours, and is begun, when we come to him by faith: it will be finished as to the soul at the hour of death, and as to the body at the day of judgment. The life of faith might be called day, in comparison of the darkness of the idolatrous and unconverted state; yet it was but night or twilight, in comparison of the light of heaven. But this night was far spent, that day was at hand: it was therefore incumbent on them to prepare for it, and anticipate it, by casting off their former sins, in which they had lived during their heathen darkness, as a man would cast off filthy and ragged garments, or as he would put off his night-clothes before he went out of his chamber. And they ought not only to put on their day-clothes, but their armour also, by praying for and cultivating all those holy dispositions, which arm the soul to repel temptation, and are at the same time its ornament and beautiful attire; even as the burnished armour is deemed the conqueror's most honourable decoration. The apostle therefore exhorted the Romans to join with him, in walking after a becoming and consistent manner, as those who enjoyed the light of the word of God and the hope of heaven; keeping at a distance from all excess or intemperance; from all sloth and unchastity, and every wanton look, word, or action, and from all contention, envy and malevolence. And then, instead of multiplying exhortations, he called upon them "to put on the Lord Jesus" himself, and thus do the whole at once. Let the mind and example of Christ be reflected in all their tempers and conduct, that all, who saw their piety, purity, zeal, benevolence and self-denial, might recognize the image and character of Christ in them. That as they stood justified before God in the robe of his imputed righteousness, so they might appear before men adorned with his image for sanctification. Then they would not contrive means for gratifying any of their carnal lusts, nor would they be anxious to provide for the indulgence of their appetites; but they would find their satisfaction in such things as pertained to the life of their souls.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

The grace of the Gospel directs our thoughts to the providence of God, as well as to his promises and commandments; and thus it induces submission and cheerful composure, where pride and the carnal mind see nothing but cause for murmurs and disquietude. Christians should always remember that there is no power but what is derived from God: "that the powers that be are ordained of God," though not according to what we might think the most eligible plan; and therefore "that every soul is bound to be subject to the higher powers:" that while so many, disdaining every yoke, "are not afraid to speak evil of dignities," and want to level all other distinctions, that themselves may rise to distinction by "resisting the power and despising the ordinance of God;" there may be also a protest in the land against such turbulent innovators, entered into by a great multitude, "who fear God, honour the king, and meddle not with those that are given to change." Indeed, it is far more agreeable to the pride of man to rise to reputation, by declaiming against kings and princes, than to be employed in humbling himself before God for his own sins, and in diligently mortifying his lusts. But surely there can be no sufficient reason why ministers of the Gospel and private Christians should leave their peaceful duties, and bring the truth into disgrace, by becoming volunteers in such services, as apostles, evangelists, and martyrs, never intermeddled with! In our happy land, however, the advantages derived from civil government are immense, our grievances minute and often imaginary, and rather the fault of human nature, than of our constitution or public administration. For speculators on this subject, (even such as profess to believe the doctrine of man's entire depravity,) almost universally blame this or the other form of government for those evils, which in fact are inseparable from our fallen nature; and they expect that benefit from the change of forms or persons, which can only be produced by the renovation of men's hearts to the holy image of God, and the mortification of that carnal self-love which is universal to mankind. Let then Christians recollect that the world lieth in wickedness, and that they are strangers and pilgrims in it; that their time here is short; that it is their wisdom and duty to make the best of things as they find them; that submission to the providence and command of God requires their peaceable subjection to governors; and that in refusing this subjection, they rebel against God, and must give an account to him of it. In general, our rulers are, what all rulers ought to be, "a terror to evil doers," and not to those who do well, as the honest and conscientious have nothing to fear from them, but enjoy great security and religious toleration, in what manner soever they choose to worship God; and that with few, if any exceptions, none are made afraid, but those who ought to fear; even they, whom the magistrate, as the minister of God, a revenger to execute wrath upon evil doers, must punish, unless he would bear the sword in vain. "So that in every way it becomes us to be subject, not only for wrath, but also for conscience' sake." At the same time magistrates may hence learn from whom and for what they have their power, and what account they must render of it; that they too may attend to their duty in the fear of God, with whom there is no respect of persons. It is also incumbent upon Christians to be exact and exemplary in paying tribute and custom; considering their rulers as God's ministers for their good, and receding from their personal interests for the public good. They should therefore avoid all appearance of those covetous and fraudulent practices, by which so many plunder their fellow-citizens, in withholding their share of the public revenue. And they ought also to refrain from contumelious and disrespectful language concerning their governors, and set an example of "rendering fear to whom fear, and honour "to whom honour is due." Let then those who eagerly declaim concerning liberty, without exactly distinguishing it from licentiousness, seriously ask themselves, whether their reasoning can be made consistent with such Scriptures as these? Whether Christ, his apostles, or his primitive disciples, ever spent their zeal about such topics? (Note, Matt. xxii. 15—22.) And whether such declamations and frequent invectives against those, whom the Scripture commands us to honour and obey, can be for the credit of the Gospel, and the benefit of true religion? As to the efforts which are any where made by those, on whom such trusts constitutionally devolve, to preserve, increase, or assist the real liberty of mankind, personal, civil, or religious, or to check the career of despotism or oppression, over men of any climate, complexion, or religion, let us zealously forward them with our prayers, and by every means, consistent with the peace and good order of the community.

V. 8—14.

While we rejoice at deliverance from the condemnation of the law, may its precepts be written in our hearts, and transcribed into our lives: that prudence, honesty, and punctuality may mark all our transactions, and regulate all our expenses, and the payment of our debts. May we learn to love all men as ourselves; and then we shall not only avoid gross injuries to their persons, connexions, property or characters, but we shall do no kind or degree of evil to any man, but shall study to be useful and beneficial in every relation and station of life. The longer we have heard and professed the Gospel, the more should we deem ourselves bound to shake off all sloth: and the nearer our salvation approacheth, the more diligent should we be to finish the work of life, and to go forth to meet our Lord. Emerging from the night of unconversion, and the twilight of our first glimmering views of heavenly things, and looking forward to the day of perfect knowledge and purity, let us reject and flee from the works of darkness, and "put on the whole armour of light:" let us study to walk in a manner consistent with, and honourable to, our profession; to avoid every kind of excess and inexpedient indulgence, and all spiritual as well as carnal wickedness; and, instead of making provision for the flesh to fulfil its lusts, let us study to put on the Lord Jesus Christ, to imbibe his spirit, to copy his conduct, to walk in every respect even as he walked.

Erasmus renders it, "not to "the determinations of disputes." 'Yet indeed the weak 'should be received, in order to the determination of disputes; that is, that at length, by knowing the truth, he 'may become stronger: but the apostle orders this to be 'done very gradually, that there may be no contention, 'or vain and unseasonable disputation. He teaches that 'they should be instructed with mildness and lenity; and 'so that in those things,' (of which he is speaking,) 'we ought to accommodate ourselves to their ignorance, 'from regard to the law of charity.' (Beza.) (Marg. Ref.) Notwithstanding the authority vested by Christ in his apostles, and their infallibility in delivering his doctrine to mankind, yet differences of opinion prevailed even among real Christians; nor did St. Paul, by an express decision and command, put a final termination to them. A proposition, indeed, may be certain and important truth, yet the heart cannot profitably receive it till suitably disposed; and a man must himself perceive the nature, evidence, and excellency of the doctrine, and the grounds on which it rests, before he can make any profitable use of it; so that to profess assent, or conform, would, without conviction, in general be hypocrisy, and always unavailing. So essential are the rights and exercise of private judgment, in all possible cases, to the existence of true religion! And so useless an encumbrance would an infallible judge be, for deciding controversies, and producing unanimity among Christians! The apostle had sufficiently declared his mind respecting the Mosaic law; and where attention to it was likely to interfere with the simplicity of men's dependence on Christ, he zealously contended against it; yet many sincere believers could not be convinced that they were under no obligations to observe it. If the method of subsequent ages had been then in use, these persons would have been excluded from the Church, and anathematized as obstinate heretics, or driven, for relief to their consciences, to separate from those, who imposed on them what they counted sinful, and afterwards they would have been shunned as schismatics. But St. Paul, in all the plenitude of his apostolical authority, could endure his fellow-christians to differ from him in opinion as to matters of inferior consequence; and, instead of peremptory injunctions, he gave a general rule, of vast importance for our conduct in all such cases. He exhorted the pastors and members of the Church at Rome to receive among them, as a brother, the weak believer; and not to perplex him with disputations about such things as might appear doubtful to conscientious persons; but to leave him, under the general use of means and loving instructions, to grow stronger in faith and riper in judgment, by the inward teaching of the Holy Spirit. This general rule applies to many particulars, both respecting doctrine, worship, and practice. If a man do not profess repentance, and a believing dependence, as a lost sinner, on the merits and atonement of Christ, "God manifest in the flesh," and a reliance on the Holy Spirit for teaching and sanctification, it does not appear, that he can properly be regarded as a believer, or admitted into the communion of the saints. (2 John 9, 10.) But when these things are professed in words, and not denied in works, a man ought at least to be received as one that is "weak in the faith," and meekly helped forward, though he may yet be under the power of many prejudices and mistakes. 'The force of the apostle's admirable reasoning in favour of candour and mutual condescension cannot be enervated by saying, that there was no separation between Jewish and Gentile Christians. Had the things judged indifferent by the latter, and apprehended sinful by the former, been imposed, a separation of communion would have ensued, and the schism on the apostle's principles would have been chargeable on the imposers. When it shall please God to awaken in the governors of established protestant churches such a spirit of moderation and goodness, joined with a true zeal for religion, as to leave such things in that natural state of indifference, in which almost all sensible men confess it is best they should be left, many separations will cease of course.' (Doddridge.) Thus the guilt of schism is reciprocally charged by all parties on their opponents; and indeed truly, when not done exclusively; for the same state of mind and heart generally prevails in those who impose unscriptural terms of communion, and in those who separate themselves from their brethren without sufficient reason; and then endeavour to make the cause of their separation appear as great as they can, to justify themselves. So that not only the governors of protestant established churches, but the leading men among dissenters and seceders also, need to be brought, by the illumination and grace of the Holy Spirit, to a fuller knowledge of the Scriptures, and more entire conformity to the temper there inculcated. In proportion as men approach nearer, in judgment and disposition, to the word of God, they will be brought nearer to each other, as the lines from the circumference of a circle approximate to each other and to the centre proportionably. Then each person concerned, (instead of decidedly justifying every particular, among those with whom he is connected, and disputing against every thing in use among such as he differs from,) will seriously compare all particulars on every side with the sacred oracles; and in consequence will discover, that neither party is entirely right, and neither entirely wrong. And this conviction, avowed and reduced to practice by the leading men, would gradually be communicated to the rest of the body, and would make way for such amendments, retrenchments, and concessions, on all sides, and such fairness, gentleness, and candour, in debating on the controverted subjects, as would in process of time effectually terminate these unhappy divisions. But "until the Spirit "be poured upon us from on high," it cannot be expected that these events will generally take place. It is, however, highly important, that individuals should well consider, from what source contentions in the Church, as well as "wars and fightings in the world," actually arise; and what is indispensably necessary, in order to terminate them.

V. 2—4. The apostle next proceeded to exemplify his general rule by a particular instance. One Christian, either a Gentile convert, or a Jew who had got over the prejudices of his nation, believed it lawful to eat any kind of meat, without regarding the distinctions of the law in that respect: another, either a Jewish convert, or one who had imbibed some Jewish prejudices, would eat only vegetables, (especially when in company with Gentile converts,) lest he should unawares eat some unclean thing. This indeed showed that he was weak and unestablished in the faith; yet it evinced him to be conscientious. Here then mutual candour was to be exercised: the Christian, who knew and used his liberty, must not despise his weak brother, as ignorant or superstitious, and so disdain to associate with him, or use contemptuous language respecting him: and, on the other hand, the scrupulous believer must by no means condemn his brother, as self-indulgent or lax in his conduct, or shun him, and speak against him, on that account. For God had accepted him, and taken him into his family, without regarding these distinctions: and it did not behoove any one to judge and condemn another's servant, for such things as his own master did not object to. He was only accountable to his own Lord, who would justify or condemn him, uphold him or leave him to fall, as he saw his real character to be: and if indeed he was a believer, the power and promise of God were engaged to uphold him, and were abundantly sufficient for that purpose. (Notes, &c. viii. 28—39. Marg. Ref.)

V. 5, 6. The case was similar as to the observance of days. Some Christians considered the Jewish sabbaths, new moons, and other solemnities, to be still in force, and so required by the law of God; and accordingly they regarded them in a religious manner: others were satisfied that the ritual law was abrogated, and that such appointments were no longer obligatory, so that in this respect they regarded every day alike; (for we cannot suppose that they did not observe the Lord's day, or any days of fasting and prayer.) In such matters it was chiefly necessary, that every man should be fully satisfied in his own mind as to his own duty, and that he acted from proper motives in it. If then a Christian regarded a day according to the law of Moses, or conscientiously set it apart for devotion, he might be supposed to do it from reverence to the authority of God: and if another Christian, deeming these distinctions to be superseded, omitted all regard to those days, which the other accounted holy; it should be supposed, that he did it with a view to the honour of Christ, of his legislative authority, and his fulfilment of all the ancient typical observances. In like manner, the believer, who ate any kind of food, should be considered as regarding the will and glory of the Lord in it; while he returned thanks both for his food and for his Christian liberty: on the other hand, he that refrained from this or the other meat, being contented with and thankful for what he did eat, should be considered as doing it from a self-denying and conscientious regard to the will of the Lord, even though his scruples were judged to be groundless. Fully persuaded in his own mind. "Let every man freely enjoy his own sentiment," 'and go on in his own way, without impediment or censure.' (Doddridge.) This interpretation is very ancient; but it does not seem to be the most natural construction of the clause. 'Let a man have that full persuasion of the lawfulness of what he doeth, or abstains from, as will preserve him from sinning against conscience in it. Let him not search into the judgments and actions of other men, about these matters, to condemn them for them.' (Whitby). 'I do not agree with those, who think that the apostle meant nothing more, than that each person should be careful not to do any thing with a doubting or hesitating conscience. For it is not enough, that our conscience consents to what we do; but it is necessary, in the first place, that our conscience be certified from the word of God.' (Beza.) (Note, 19—23.)

V. 7—9. It was an acknowledged principle, that no real Christian allows his own humour, indulgence, interest, or credit, to be the end for which he lives, or acts, as to the general tenour of his conduct; nor does he even avoid, desire, or meet death, from selfish motives; but whether his life be prolonged, he aims to spend it to the glory of Christ; or whether death be expected, he refers it to him, to be ordered in all respects for the glory of his own name; so that whether the Christian lives or dies, he belongs to the Lord, to be disposed of as he pleases; and is his beloved, to be taken care of by him in all possible events. For to this very end Christ both died on the cross, and rose again, and liveth anew in heaven, that in human nature he might be the sovereign Lord of all his people, both during their lives and after their death, as they willingly devote themselves to him, and are prompt to labour, suffer, or die, for his sake; as he orders all things respecting the time and circumstances of their death, for his own glory and their good; and as, when they die, they are taken to be with him for ever, and he will raise their bodies to share the same felicity. Christ is also the Lord of all the dead, and of the living who do not believe in him; he spares their lives, cuts them off by death, and executes vengeance upon them, as he sees good; yet the former sense seems to have been principally intended. It is worthy of observation, that the apostle most cogently showed professed Christians what they ought to be and do, by stating the character and aims of true believers, and by teaching them what charity would suppose, concerning their brethren who differed from them, if their conduct were in other respects consistent with their profession. "The Lord," evidently means Jesus Christ in these verses, which contain a very conclusive argument in proof of his Deity, that the next verses undeniably confirm; for to what mere creature can we be thus entirely devoted, without manifest idolatry?

V. 10—12. This suggested another reason why Christians should not judge or despise one another, as they must all stand in judgment before Christ, when it would be known from what motive every man had acted. The prophecy referred to has been before explained of Christ, as "JEHOVAH, our Righteousness," (Notes, Is. xlv. 20—25.) but the apostle's transition from "the judgment-seat of Christ," to "giving an account of ourselves to God," shows how familiar it was to him to understand the predictions uttered by JEHOVAH as the words of his divine Lord and Saviour. Shall confess to God. 'That is, shall adore and acknowledge me as God.' (Beza.) 'If these words, which the apostle certainly spake of JEHOVAH, be well applied by the apostle to Christ, Christ must also be the Person intended by them; for how could the apostle prove, that "every knee must bow" to Christ, from the words of God, "to me every knee 13 Let us not therefore [d] judge one another any more: [e] but judge this rather, that no man [f] put a stumbling-block, [g] or an occasion to fall, in his brother's way.

15 But if [l] thy brother be grieved with thy meat, [m] now walkest thou not † charitably. [n] Destroy not him with thy meat, for whom Christ died.

16 Let not then [o] your good be evil spoken of:

V. 13—18. The apostle concludes this part of his subject, by exhorting Christians, especially the Jewish converts, not to judge, censure, or condemn one another any more; and he then enters on another exhortation, in which the Gentile converts were principally concerned. This he introduces by using the same word, in somewhat of a different sense. Instead of exercising their judgment about others, let them learn to act judiciously in their own conduct, that they might not ensnare their brethren, or occasion them to sin, as if a man should heedlessly lay a stone or a trap in another's way, which might occasion his falling or being hurt. This they would be apt to do, by an inexpedient use of lawful things. The apostle knew, by the doctrine and revelation of Christ, that no kind of food was any longer polluting in itself, yet if a man supposed the ceremonial distinctions to be still in force, the meat which he ate contrary to his judgment and conscience would be unclean to him; and he therefore ought to abstain, till more fully satisfied. Now if a stronger and better informed believer induced his weaker brother, by his example and influence, to eat such things as his conscience forbade, and so to bring guilt and distress upon himself, it was obvious that he did not walk charitably. For his conduct directly tended to the ruin of one for whom Christ died; seeing it tempted him to sin, which naturally leads to condemnation. This does not imply that the weak brother would actually perish; but the contrast is made between the love of Christ to the weak believer, who shed his blood to save him, and the want of love in his stronger brother, who would not abridge himself of his meal, from regard to his welfare, but would rather prove an occasion of sin to him, and so hazard the loss of the soul of one, whom he might hope to be a believer, than restrain himself in the exercise of his Christian liberty! We may, however, observe, that the apostles did not write in that exact systematical style which some affect, otherwise they would scrupulously have avoided such expressions. In using their liberty, therefore, which was good in itself, Christians ought to be careful not to do it in so unguarded a manner, or with such bad effects, as might give occasion to its being evil spoken of: for the privileges of the kingdom of God no more consisted in meats and drinks, than its requirements did: so that a believer, who would use his liberty, at any rate and at all events, laid as undue a stress on the indulgence of the new dispensation, as a Jewish convert did on the ceremonial distinctions of the old one. To stand justified before God, to be at peace with him, to possess peace in the heart and conscience, and to experience that pure joy which the Holy Spirit communicates, are the great privileges of the kingdom of God: and to walk by faith before him as a reconciled Father, in righteousness, and in cheerful holy obedience, according to the grand requirements of the moral law, and by the sanctification of the Spirit, is the substance of the duties of the kingdom: and he, who in such things serveth and obeyeth Christ, is acceptable to God, and is approved before men to be a true believer, and should therefore be received as such by his brethren, without respect to his differences of opinion or practice. To infer from hence, as some have incautiously done, that a peaceable exemplary Christian, who is not too rigid in his sentiments, or tinctured with bigotry, will generally be esteemed and loved by mankind, would imply a censure on Paul, on the other apostles, on the prophets, on the most eminent believers in every age, nay, on Christ himself, as if they had not been so candid and liberal as we ought to be: for we know what favour the world showed them. But in fact the men of the Church, and not those of the world, are exclusively meant. 'It evidences a cruel 'mind, to make greater account of food than of a 'brother's salvation; which they do, who can endure to 'eat, when it causes a brother to offend, and so gives 'him occasion of turning aside from the Gospel. We 'ought to copy the example of Christ, who, so far from 'destroying the weak for food, poured out his life for 'them.' (Beza.) by thy brother stumbleth, or is offended, or is made weak.

22 Hast [g] thou faith? have it to thyself before God. [h] Happy is he that condemneth not himself in that thing which he alloweth.

V. 19—23. The apostle proceeded to inculcate an assiduous and persevering attention to the interests of peace among Christians, and to all those things by which mutual edification might be promoted. Let then none of those, who understood their liberty, allow their own indulgence in any kind of food to counteract the work of God, in the conversion of the Jews, the spread of the Gospel, or the sanctification of believers; or suffer it to destroy any of his rational creatures. Indeed the apostle would have it known, as his decided judgment, (though he had been educated a Pharisee,) that all kinds of meats were alike pure in themselves: yet it would be evil for a man to eat them, when it had a direct tendency to seduce a weak brother into sin. Nay, so much ought love to preponderate over all such considerations, that it would be good and right for a man to abstain wholly from flesh and wine, and every other indulgence, by which his brother would be tempted to sin, made uneasy in his conscience, or weakened in his hope, and the vigour of his obedience. So that they who had stronger faith, and assuredly believed that they might lawfully eat any kind of food, should not make ostentation of it, or improperly seize on every occasion of acting according to it; but rather possess it as in the sight of God, who would know their uprightness when others judged them on that account: and let them use their liberty with humility, caution, prudence, and self-denial; and without seeming to prefer themselves, or to despise their weaker brethren. It would be a great happiness to a man, to be free from all doubt or self-condemnation, in those things which he allowed himself to do: but if any one questioned whether any indulgence were lawful or not, and yet example, persuasion, or inclination, prevailed with him to venture upon it, he would certainly commit a sin, for which his conscience would condemn him, and for which even God would condemn him, if he did not repent of it. For as he did it not in faith, as he was not fully persuaded in his own mind that he was allowed by the Scripture to do it, he would be guilty of preferring his own inclination to the dictates of his conscience, and the supposed will of God.—In general, every action must be sinful, which is not done in a believing apprehension that we are acting according to the command, or by the allowance, of God, and may therefore consider ourselves to be in the way of his promised blessing. It is obvious how groundless the scruples of some serious persons from this text concerning the Lord's supper must be: for the apostle's argument is wholly about a subject entirely of another nature.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—4.

It is of great importance for us to distinguish between those who are weak in faith, and such as are strangers or enemies to it; for we ought to receive and affectionately to cherish the former, but to beware of and withdraw from the latter. It is, however, very difficult for us to bear properly with the mistakes, infirmities, and the prejudices of our brethren; or to make proper allowances for the weakness of natural capacity, the bias of bad education, or the effects of partial and erroneous instruction, under their first religious impressions. We are all prone to make our own views the standard of truth, to deem things certain which to others appear very doubtful, to expect by eager disputation to bring men to see with our eyes, to perplex new converts with topics which they cannot as yet understand, and to expect them at once to acquiesce in all those truths, which we have been learning for years. So that it is almost impracticable to prevail with those to receive and hold communion with each other, who have been received by the Lord, and enjoy communion with him! Thus some have been expelled by their brethren, or have separated from them; and contests or schisms have disgraced the Church, grieved her best friends, and rejoiced her enemies; thus Christians have despised, or condemned, each other about doubtful or unimportant matters, as if the very essence of faith and piety had been concerned! The distinctions between meats and days were at least as important as many things which are now controverted among us; and it was far more certain on which side the truth was found. Yet men might be real Christians, who could not receive even the apostle's determination of the controversy. Surely then we should enlarge our candour beyond those narrow limits which many would assign to it. And if we could demonstrate every tittle of our doctrine, and every part of our worship, to be scriptural, yet we ought not to despise or condemn a man, because he is not able to see the conclusiveness of our arguments; and if we must assume it as undeniable, that he is just as far mistaken as he differs from us, we should at least treat him with that tenderness, which we show to one who wants an eye, a leg, or an arm. All, who love the Gospel, ought to shun such persons as excite divisions among those who appear to hate sin and love Christ; and such shibboleths, as tend to multiply, to perpetuate, or to exasperate them: let us cease to despise or judge one another, especially about things which are not essential to salvation; let us beware that we do not attempt to reject, or to cast down, those whom God hath received and will uphold; or to judge and condemn his conscientious servants.

V. 5—12.

It behooves us to remember our own unworthiness and fallibility, and the numerous instances in which we have been entirely mistaken, when confident that we were in the right; and, endeavouring to be fully persuaded in our own minds about our conduct, let us leave others to the judgment of God. Thus if some deem it expedient to observe a day, in commemoration of any of those great events which relate to our salvation, let them spend it in a holy manner to the glory of God; and if others judge it best not to observe such days, let them act with humble

CHAP. XV.

In condescension to the weak, the strong should give up their own will for the good of others, after the example of Christ, 1—3. All the scriptures were written for our instruction, 4. The apostle prays for love and harmony among believers in the worship of God, 5—7; shows that the scriptures foretel the union of Jews and Gentiles in the service of God; subjoining his prayers, 8—13; that he thus exhorts the Christians at Rome, as the apostle of the Gentiles, 14—16; and his extensive labours and usefulness, 17—21: he avows his purpose of visiting Rome, in his way to Spain; desires their prayers in respect of his previous journey to Jerusalem, with the contributions of the Gentile converts, 22—32; and prays for them, 33.

simplicity, in dissenting from the opinion and practice of their brethren. Then all may be done in a quiet, peaceable, thankful, and Christian manner, as it becomes those who profess neither "to live nor to die to themselves, but to "him who died for them, and rose again," and "ever liveth "to be the Lord both of the dead and of the living." Instead therefore of censuring, reviling, deriding, or despising one another, let us all prepare to appear before the judgment-seat of Christ, as he hath sworn that every knee shall bow and every tongue shall confess to him. We should therefore carefully judge ourselves, both as to our state and conduct, that our confession of Christ may be proved genuine, by our devoted obedience to him.

V. 13—23.

While we shun superstitious scruples, and assert our Christian liberty, let us beware of spiritual pride and self-preference: and whilst we pity such as are yet enslaved to needless observances, let us be careful not to abuse our liberty by an inexpedient use of things lawful, or by venturing upon such as are doubtful. Let us consider what effects our conduct and example may have on others: and, though it may not be always proper to humour the scrupulosity of some persons, yet, when there is a probability of grieving, offending, or turning aside a weak believer, or of stumbling a hopeful inquirer, we should waive our liberty, if nothing call for the exercise of it, except our own indulgence. For surely it cannot be an imitation of the love of Christ, who died for the weak as well as the strong, if we put any personal satisfaction in competition with the spiritual good of our brethren.—Verily it must be confessed that we are often faulty in such matters; and thus our good comes to be evil spoken of, because we use lawful things in an uncharitable and selfish manner. But let us remember, that the comforts and obedience of the Gospel are alike superior to meats and drinks; and that both unite in "righteousness, peace, and joy in the "Holy Ghost:" and that when we most highly value these spiritual privileges, and abound in these spiritual duties, we enjoy the greatest assurance that we are accepted by God, and best approve ourselves before men to be real believers. Let us then follow after all those things, which tend to peace and mutual edification; let us study a holy indifference about the most lawful earthly enjoyments; and learn to renounce whatever comes in competition with the welfare of our brethren, the peace of the Church, and the glory of God. Let us pray for more humility and self-denial in the exercise of our knowledge, more to regard our acceptance with God, and less to desire the applause of men. In every doubtful or indifferent matter, "Happy is he, who condemneth not himself in the thing "which he alloweth." Numbers venture into places and upon actions, against which their own consciences revolt, because they are induced by inclination, and emboldened by the example of those, who on some account have obtained the reputation of pious men. But whether the things themselves be lawful or not, as they cannot do them in faith, as they hesitate concerning the lawfulness of them, and as they cannot heartily pray for the presence and blessing of God in them, they are condemned for indulging themselves in a doubtful case. But few are so happy as to be quite free from self-condemnation in every thing that they allow: a sound judgment, a simple heart, a tender conscience, and an habitual self-denial, are necessary for the enjoyment of this comfort: and most of us see frequent cause to condemn ourselves, and, by daily repentance, faith, and prayer, to deprecate the merited condemnation of our God.

NOTES.

CHAP. XV. V. 1—3. The apostle here proceeds with the argument of the preceding chapter. He admits that they, who knew their liberty in respect of the distinctions of meats and days, were generally stronger in faith, as well as sounder in judgment, than their more scrupulous brethren. But for that reason, they who were able to do it ought to bear with the infirmities of the weak, who were not able to rise superior to them; and not to despise them; but even to bear their infirmities, by patiently submitting to self-denial on their account, and meekly enduring their uncharitable censures, while they persevered in endeavours to promote their welfare, and to maintain a peaceful communion with them. So that, instead of pleasing and gratifying themselves in the indulgent use of their liberty, or humouring pride, self-will, or resentment, they ought readily to recede from their own inclinations, in order to please their neighbour as far as could conduce to his good, or to mutual edification, by obviating his prejudices and gaining upon his affections. Thus Christ, from love to sinners, renounced his own ease, comfort, and reputation, exposed himself to the reproach and revilings of the enemies of God, and lived in this polluted, miserable world, exposed to contempt, calumnies, and persecutions, till he finished his sufferings by the ignominious death of the cross, amidst the insults of his embittered murderers; according as it had been predicted of him by David, who spoke as a type of him. (Notes, &c. Ps. lxix. 9. 20.)

V. 4—7. The apostle took occasion from this quotation, to remind the Christians at Rome, that the whole of the ancient scriptures had been written for their instruction, as much as for that of those to whom they were first delivered; whether they contained types or predictions of Christ, gracious promises, precepts, admonitions, or examples, in order that by patiently cleaving to the Lord in faith and holy obedience, amidst all their trials and temptations, and by taking comfort from the daily perusal of the Scriptures, they might possess a joyful hope of heaven, notwithstanding past sins and present manifold defects. He therefore prayed for them, to that God, who is infinitely patient and long-suffering towards us, who commands us in like manner to bear with one another, and who is the Author and Giver of patience to his people, and the Source of all their consolations, that he would render his exhortations effectual, and grant them to be of one judgment and one heart, disposed to entire harmony and affection, and full of disinterested love and compassion for each other, after the example of Christ, and according to his commands. That so nothing might hinder them from joining, as "with one mind and one mouth," in the worship of God, in glorifying him for his mercies, and adoring his perfections, as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who is approached by sinners through his beloved Son, and is become their reconciled Father in him. And he again exhorted them to lay aside prejudices and disputes, and to receive one another as brethren, without regarding the distinctions of Jew and Gentile, or differences of opinion on these matters, even as Christ had received them without making exceptions to any of them, that God might be glorified in their salvation, as he also would be in their mutual love and harmony.

V. 8—13. In order to unite Jews and Gentiles in one church, and conciliate them to each other, Jesus Christ had assumed his human nature among the Jews, he had submitted to circumcision, and exercised his personal ministry with unwearied labour and self-denial, among circumcised persons, and he commanded his apostles to preach the Gospel to the Jews in the first place. Thus he fulfilled the predictions and promises delivered to the fathers of that nation: the Gentile converts could therefore have no pretence for despising them. On the other hand, after Christ's ascension, the Gospel had by his command been extensively preached among the Gentiles, and with vast success, that they also might glorify God for his mercy, as it had been predicted by the ancient prophets, (Notes, Deut. xxxii. 43. Ps. xviii. 49. cxvii. Is. xi. 1—10.) So that the Jewish converts could have no reason to exclude or shun the Gentiles, whether they regarded the will of their ascended Lord, or the prophecies of the Scripture. In the last quotation it had been shown that the Gentiles were to trust, or hope, in that Messiah, who was to reign over them: hence the apostle took occasion to pray that God, the Author and object of hope, would fill them with abundance of spiritual joy and peace, by enabling them simply to believe in him, as revealed in his beloved Son, and as relying on his gracious promises; that so they might attain to an assured, abiding, realizing, and anticipating hope of eternal life, through the sanctifying and comforting energy of the Holy Spirit. Rejoice, &c. (10.) 'The 'Hebrew interpreters render the original, (Deut. xxxii. 43,) "Celebrate, O ye nations, his people." 'Certainly 'the nations could not cordially extol the people as happy 'and blessed, unless, affected with their felicity, they ac'knowledged and worshipped the same God. The apostle, 'as it were, seals all his preceding exhortations with 'prayers, that the Lord would bestow on them the things 'which he commanded.' (Beza.) Reign over, &c. (12.) 'That which is out of the Hebrew rightly rendered "for "an ensign," 'is by the Greek translators, "to bear rule;"

14 ¶ And [g] I myself also am persuaded of you, my brethren, that ye also are [h] full of goodness, filled with all knowledge, [i] able also to admonish one another.

15 Nevertheless, brethren, [k] I have written the more boldly unto you in some sort, [l] as putting you in mind, [m] because of the grace that is given to me of God,

16 That [n] I should be the minister of Jesus Christ to the Gentiles, [o] ministering the Gospel of God, that [p] the * offering up of the Gentiles might be acceptable, [q] being sanctified by the Holy Ghost.

17 I have therefore [r] whereof I may glory through Jesus Christ [s] in those things which pertain to God.

18 For [t] I will not dare to speak of any of those things [u] which Christ hath not wrought by me, [x] to make the Gentiles obedient, [y] by word and deed, 19 Through [z] mighty signs and wonders, [a] by the power of the Spirit of God; [b] so that from Jerusalem, and round about unto Illyricum, I have [c] fully preached the Gospel of Christ.

20 Yea, [d] so have I strived to preach the Gospel, not where Christ was named, lest I should [e] build upon another man's foundation:

21 But as it is written, [f] To whom he was not spoken of, they shall see: and they that have not heard, shall understand.

'because it is the office of the king to defend, and by arms 'to protect, his people.' (Hammond.)

V. 14—17. The apostle, being about to conclude his epistle, shows the Romans why he, who had never seen them, had addressed them in so earnest and copious a manner. This did not arise from any doubt that he entertained concerning them; for he was fully persuaded that they were replete with that goodness, that kind and affectionate spirit, which he had inculcated, as well as with knowledge in every part of the Gospel, so as to be able to admonish one another without other assistance. Nevertheless, he had written with the more confidence to them about some particulars, to put them in remembrance of their duties and their dangers, because God had peculiarly favoured him in appointing him to be the apostle and the minister of Christ to the Gentiles. His special ministry required him to preach the Gospel among the Gentiles, and to superintend their affairs, (as the priest used to do the sacrifice, or the burning of incense,) in order that their persons and services might be presented to God in an acceptable manner, by the hands of the great high Priest within the veil, being sanctified by the gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit, and he therefore thought himself called on to attempt this service towards them also. For in this important trust he had some ground of glorying, not in himself, but in the unmerited and rich favour of Jesus Christ towards him, not in carnal things, but in those that pertained to God and his worship.

V. 18—21. The apostle's success had corresponded to the importance of the trust delegated to him. He would not speak of what Christ had not indeed wrought by him, in bringing the heathen nations to obey the truth, in word and deed. It seems some teachers were forward to do this; but he would not venture to do himself, what he condemned as folly and sin, in other men. (Notes, 2 Cor. x. 12—16. Jude 9.) What had been done was indeed enirely the work of Christ, but he had chosen to make use of him as his instrument. His preaching had been attended with extraordinary miracles, wrought by the power of the Holy Spirit, whose divine agency had also disposed the hearts of the hearers to embrace the Gospel. So that from Jerusalem, in a very extensive circle of some thousands of miles, even to Illyricum on the borders of Italy, he had fully preached the Gospel of Christ, and instructed vast multitudes with great accuracy in that holy doctrine. Indeed, it had been his ambition, (so the original word signifies) to carry the glad tidings of salvation to those who had not before heard of Christ, and thus to face the dangers and hardships of making the first assault on the kingdom of Satan in every place. Nor was he disposed in general to build on the foundation laid by other ministers, who were competent to carry on the work which they had happily begun, but rather to fulfil the Scripture, which foretold that many nations and rulers would see and understand such things, as they had before been strangers to. (Note, Is. lii. 15.) 'Probably, in 'mentioning this, he may glance on those false apostles, 'who crept into churches which he had planted, and 'endeavoured to establish their own reputation and in'fluence there, by alienating the hearts of his own con'verts from him, while, like some in our own days, 'they built on his grand and noble foundation an edifice 'of wood, and hay, and stubble.' By word and deed. (18.) By the manner in which he hath enabled me to 'speak, and the things which he hath strengthened me to 'perform.' (Doddridge.) As there is no preposition in the Greek, the clause may be rendered, "in word and "deed," and applied, as above, to the obedience of the Gentiles: and this seems better to accord with the general language of Scripture. (Marg. Ref.) Unto Illyricum (19.) 'I do not think that these words necessarily import, that 'St. Paul had penetrated into Illyricum; but rather that 'he had come to the confines of Illyricum; and that these 'confines were the external boundary of his travels. 'Illyricum adjoins unto Macedonia; measuring from Je'rusalem towards Rome, it lies close behind it. If there'fore St. Paul traversed the whole country of Macedonia, 'the route would necessarily bring him to the confines of 'Illyricum. Now the account of St. Paul's second visit 'to the peninsula of Greece is contained in these words.

22 For which cause also [g] I have been * much hindered from coming to you.

23 But now having no more place in these parts, [h] and having a great desire these many years to come unto you;

26 For [n] it hath pleased them of Macedonia and Achaia to make a certain contribution, for [o] the poor saints which are at Jerusalem.

27 It hath pleased them verily; [p] and their debtors they are. For if the Gentiles have been made partakers of their spiritual things, their duty is also to minister unto them in carnal things.

28 When therefore I have performed this, [q] and have sealed to them this fruit, [r] I will come by you into Spain.

29 And I am sure that when I come unto you, I shall come [s] in the fulness of the blessing of the Gospel of Christ.

"He departed for to go into Macedonia, and when he had gone over those parts, and had given them much exhortation, he came into Greece." 'This account allows, or rather leads us to suppose, that St. Paul, in going over Macedonia, had passed so far to the west as to come into those parts of the country which were contiguous to Illyricum, if he did not enter into Illyricum itself. The history and the epistle therefore so far agree, and the agreement is much strengthened by a coincidence of time. At the time when this epistle was written, St. Paul might say, in conformity to the history, that he had come unto Illyricum; much before this time he could not have said so; for upon his former journey into Macedonia his route is laid down, from the time of his landing at Philippi to his sailing from Corinth, which confines him to the eastern side of the peninsula, and therefore keeps him all the while at a considerable distance from Illyricum.' (Paley.)

V. 22—29. As the Romans were already favoured with the Gospel, it did not accord with the apostle's plan to leave his more urgent employment to go among them; and this had long hindered him from visiting them. But, as he had now brought the churches which he had planted to establishment in the faith, and as he had no immediate call to any new scene of action in the parts where he had before laboured, so he purposed to gratify the desire which he had for many years experienced, of going to Rome. But he also intended a journey into Spain, a large country still much further to the west, where probably the Gospel had not at that time been preached; in his way he purposed to stay for a time at Rome, and when he had in part satisfied his affectionate desire of communing with the believers there, he expected they would help him forward toward Spain. But, in the mean time, he must take a long journey in the opposite direction, in order to perform an important service to the poor Christians at Jerusalem, for whom the Gentile converts had raised a very liberal contribution. This they had done willingly; but indeed they were in some respects debtors to them. For the Jewish preachers had first carried the Gospel among them, and the primitive believers there had impoverished themselves in promoting that doctrine, the blessing of which they now shared with the Gentiles, whose duty it therefore was to communicate to them of that temporal abundance, which was so generally spent in a carnal manner. When therefore he had performed this service, and had affixed his seal, as it were, to this good fruit produced by the Gentiles, in order to conciliate the minds of their Jewish brethren, he intended to pass by Rome to Spain. And whenever he should be permitted to come to them, he was confident that he should be employed to communicate to them an abundant supply of those spiritual gifts, consolations, and blessings, which are conveyed to sinners by the Gospel of Christ; so that they would certainly be edified, established, comforted, and increased in numbers, by his coming, his preaching, and the miraculous powers that he should be employed to impart to them. Thus the apostle never lost sight of his object, or let slip any opportunity of inculcating mutual love between the Jewish and Gentile converts. (Gal. i. 18. ii. 1.) It is not known whether the apostle ever accomplished his intended journey into Spain. But as Clement, writing from Rome, in the first century, said that he preached 'to the utmost bounds of the west,' it is most probable that he did. He, however, went to Rome in a very different manner than he had purposed. I go to Jerusalem. (24—26.) (Marg. Ref.) 'Here, at length, but fetched from three different writings, we have obtained the several circumstances, which the epistle to the Romans brings together, viz. a contribution in Achaia for the Christians at Jerusalem, a contribution in Macedonia for the same purpose, and an approaching journey of St. Paul to Jerusalem. We have these circumstances, each by some hint in the passage in which it is mentioned, or by the date of the writing in which the passage occurs, fixed to a particular time; and we have that time turning out, upon examination, to be in all the same, namely, towards the close of St. Paul's second visit to the peninsula of Greece.' (Paley.) This fixes the writing of this epistle to a particular part of the narrative of the apostle's labours; but there is some difficulty in determining in what year those events took place. Some date them A. D. 58, others A. D. 60, or 61.

V. 30—33. The apostle regarded his journey to Jerusalem as of so much importance, that he ought not to decline it; yet he was aware that it would be attended with great danger and difficulty, through the enmity of the Jews, and the strong prejudices even of the Christians against him, which neither his zeal in their behalf, nor the liberality of the Gentile converts, could counterbalance. He therefore besought the Romans, for the sake of Christ, their common Lord, and for that love's sake, which the Spirit of Christ had wrought in their hearts to each other, (according to his own most loving nature and conduct towards them,) that they would earnestly unite in prayers for him, that he might be protected from the malice of the unbelieving or disobedient Jews, who would otherwise disappoint all the plans which he had formed; and that the prejudices of the Jewish believers might be so removed, that they might accept and take in good part the service which he went to perform. That so, if the Lord pleased, he might not come to them grieved and disappointed, but with joy and comfort; and also have his spirit refreshed and enlivened by joining with them in thanksgivings to God, and by what he witnessed of the grace bestowed upon them. In the mean time he prayed, that the God of peace, as reconciled to believers in Christ, and as disposing them to live together in peace and harmony, might be with them all, for their comfort, and to prevent all disputes and divisions among themselves.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

The powerful of this world often domineer over the weak, but it ought not to be so in the Church of Christ; on the contrary, every one, in proportion as he is strong in faith and grace, should be tender, patient, and compassionate to the feeble-minded, to those who are compassed with infirmities, perplexed in their views, harassed with scruples, doubts, and temptations, and unable to enjoy the peace and comfort of the Gospel, though they appear to walk in the obedience of it. Even if their infirmities be attended with bigotry, censoriousness, or peevishness, we ought still to bear with and pity them, and to submit to self-denial for their good; and instead of pleasing ourselves, whatever may become of them, we ought to give up our own humour and inclination, as far as we can please them for their good to edification; though we must not be men-pleasers, or help to deceive them by our flatteries and compliances. If any man deem himself strong, and he be at the same time disposed to revile, despise, condemn, and reject, the weak and scrupulous, because they cannot accede to his whole system, it is evident that pride and selfishness are stronger in his heart than faith and grace; and that he hath more of "the "knowledge that puffeth up, than of the love that edifieth." He is the most advanced Christian, who is most conformed to Christ, and most willing to give up his own ease or indulgence, and to endure reproach and suffering, after His example, and in prosecution of that great design for which he shed his blood; and if in doing this, we are reviled by furious zealots and uncharitable bigots, we may, with humble accommodation, use the Redeemer's words, "the "reproaches, of them that reproached thee are fallen upon "me." For whatever is written, either in the Old or the New Testament, is intended for our instruction, and may be applied to our case, for our direction and encouragement; that, by patient faith, persevering obedience, and comfort derived from the word of God, 'we may embrace, 'and ever hold fast, the blessed hope of everlasting life, 'as given to us in Jesus Christ.' Thus relying on the mercy and truth of the God of all patience and consolation, we should pray continually, that we, and our brethren in Christ, may be like minded towards one another, after his example; that the divisions of the Church being healed, all who are called by his name "may glorify God, even "the Father of our Lord Jesus, with one mind and with "one mouth." And till this perfect union shall be effected, we should learn to agree, notwithstanding our differences about non-essentials, and to receive one another as brethren, while we hold the great doctrines of salvation for sinners by the blood and Spirit of Christ; and this will tend greatly to the credit of the Gospel, and the glory of God.

V. 8—21.

The whole plan of redemption is suited to reconcile us to one another, as well as to our gracious God; and we may say of every contention among Christians, "An "enemy hath done this." The fulfilment of ancient promises and prophecies, in the coming of Christ among the Jews, and in the great success of the Gospel among the Gentiles, and through distant nations and languages, that they might glorify God for his mercy, and hope in that "Branch from the Root of Jesse," who was raised up to reign over them, should teach us to cease from our murmurings and disputings, and to join in grateful praises and thanksgivings to him, who glories in his merciful victories among the heathen, and hath called them to rejoice with his people. If we would have the God of hope to fill our hearts "with all peace, and joy in believing," (and a sinner can have abiding holy joy and peace in no other way,) if we would "abound in hope, by the power of the Holy "Ghost;" we must rely on, and pray for, the teaching and influences of that divine Agent; and we must be careful neither to grieve him by our evil tempers or sinful passions, nor to quench his sacred fire by negligence, or procrastination; for thus we often bring darkness and disconsolation upon ourselves. We should hope the best of others, and commend what is good in their conduct: but they, who are really most full of goodness and knowledge, and able to admonish one another, will be most thankful to be reminded of their duty, and cautioned against danger, by those who are authorized to watch over them; who have obtained grace to be faithful in their ministry; and who evidently desire that the persons and services of their brethren may be acceptable to God through Jesus Christ, being sanctified by the Holy Ghost. It is indeed an honour to be employed by the Lord Jesus; and for him to work by us, in those things which pertain to God, and in rendering sinners obedient in word and deed. But the whole glory must ultimately be referred to him: ostentation should carefully be avoided in speaking on such subjects; and it is seldom expedient to mention ourselves in these matters, except as we want to obviate men's prejudices against our ministry, when they impede our usefulness. But indeed, how trivial are the labours, and how limited is the usefulness, of most of us, when compared with those of the apostle, whose ministry was attended with the power of the Holy Ghost in so remarkable a degree, and whose unwearied labours would admit of no bounds, but those of the human species, or of his own life! It is honourable, when ministers, who have the opportunity, boldly face opposition and hardship in carrying the Gospel to those places, where Christ hath not yet been named; and when they would rather make irruptions into the uninvaded provinces of Satan's dark domain, than stay to garrison such as have already been torn from him. This is a noble ambition; but as most of us must in some measure build upon the foundation that others have laid before us, we should at least take heed how we build thereon, that our superstructure may not disgrace or expose the good foundation, as is too often the case.

◆

Our best desires may meet with many hinderances; our well concerted plans may be disappointed; our very prayers may seem to remain unanswered: but, proceeding in the path of duty with self-denying zeal and love, endeavouring to conciliate the minds of Christians to one another, and to excite them to emulation only in good works, and seeking our comfort in communion with God and his saints, all will surely terminate to our advantage: and even the services which we would have performed, and could not, shall be graciously accepted and rewarded. The rich believer should deem himself a debtor to the poor; and they who have been made partakers of spiritual blessings should count it their duty to minister in carnal things to those, through whom they were brought to the knowledge of salvation. There is a blessing, a fulness of blessing, in the Gospel of Christ, which we should expect to know and to communicate, but with which numbers are totally unacquainted, and which most of us experience in a degree far beneath what the primitive believers did. We should therefore strive together in our prayers for each other, that, for Christ's sake, and by the love of the Spirit, a great blessing may come upon the souls of Christians, and the labours of ministers: that envy, prejudice, and a party-spirit, may not prevent the faithful zealous servants of Christ from being accepted by the saints, in their disinterested endeavours to do them good, (as frequently is the case:) but that they may meet the people, wherever they go, with joy, and may by them be refreshed; and that the God of peace may be the ever-present Comforter of all, who "love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity." Amen.

NOTES.

CHAP. XVI. V. 1, 2. It is probable that this epistle was sent by Phebe, according to what is added at the end of it in our Bibles; but as these additions are of no authority, and sometimes palpably erroneous, they are not here inserted. Cenchrea was the sea-port of Corinth, (where a separate Church was founded,) which shows that the apostle wrote from Corinth. Phebe acted as a servant, or a deaconess, to the Church at Cenchrea, and was probably employed in relieving the needy women among them. This she must have undertaken freely, out of love to the work alone, as she appears to have been a person in good circumstances. (Notes, 1 Tim. v. 9—16.) The Christians at Rome were exhorted to receive her to their fellowship, and also to assist and support her in the business which had brought her thither, as she had been helpful to many Christians, and to Paul also, who was not backward to acknowledge his obligations to her.

V. 3, 4. Aquila and Priscilla had now returned to Rome, though but a short time before they had been at Ephesus. (Notes, Acts xviii. 1, 2. 24—28. 1 Cor. xvi. 19.) They had ventured their lives in protecting the apostle at Ephesus, as if they had been willing to lay down their own necks, and to be beheaded in his stead: and as his life was so useful to all the churches of the Gentiles, they, as well as he, were under the greatest obligations to them. He therefore gave his affectionate salutations and good wishes to them, and to the Church in their house; or to the several Christians, of whom their family was composed, and who met continually together to worship God. 'Priscilla and Aquila had originally 'been inhabitants of Rome.' (Acts xviii. 2.) 'They 'were connected therefore with the place to which the 'salutations were sent. St. Paul became acquainted with 'them at Corinth during his first visit into Greece. They 'accompanied him upon his return into Asia; were settled 'for some time at Ephesus; (Acts xviii. 19—26;) and 'appear to have been with St. Paul when he wrote from 'that place his first epistle to the Corinthians, (1 Cor.

‘ xvi. 19.) Not long after he went from Ephesus into Macedonia, and after "he had gone over those parts," proceeded from thence on his second visit into Greece; during which visit, or rather at the conclusion of it, this Epistle was written. We have therefore the time of St. Paul's residence at Ephesus, after he had written to the Corinthians, the time taken up by his progress through Macedonia, and his three months' abode in Greece: we have the sum of these three periods allowed for Aquila and Priscilla going back to Rome, so as to be there when the epistle was written. Now what this leads us to observe is, the danger of scattering names and circumstances in writings like the present; how implicated they often are with dates and places; and that nothing but truth can preserve consistency. Had the notes of time in this epistle fixed the writing of it to any date, prior to St. Paul's first residence at Corinth, the salutation of Aquila and Priscilla would have contradicted the history; because it would have been prior to his acquaintance with these persons. If the notes of time had fixed it during that residence at Corinth; during his journey to Jerusalem when he first returned out of Greece; or during his progress through the Lesser Asia, upon which he proceeded to Antioch; an equal contradiction would have been incurred: because it appears, (Acts xviii 2—26;) ‘ that, during all this time, they were either with St. Paul, or abiding at Ephesus. Lastly, had the notes of time in this epistle, which we have seen to be perfectly incidental, compared with the notes of time in the first epistle to the Corinthians, fixed this epistle to be either contemporary with that, or prior to it, a similar contradiction would have ensued; first, because, when the epistle to the Corinthians was written, Aquila and Priscilla were along with St. Paul, (1 Cor. xvi. 19;) and because, secondly, the history does not allow us to suppose, that between the time of their becoming acquainted with him and the writing of that epistle, they could have gone back to Rome, so as to have been saluted in an epistle to that city; and then have come to St. Paul at Ephesus, so as to be joined with him in saluting the Church at Corinth. As it is, all things are consistent.' (Paley.) The author has transcribed this passage, chiefly to give the less learned reader an idea and a specimen, of the manner in which able critics can, almost in all cases, detect literary forgeries, and establish the authenticity of ancient writings. This is peculiarly needful in an age of bold infidelity, in which the most confident assertions are made, and suppositions advanced, without the shadow of proof: as if a literary forgery were attended with little difficulty, or danger of detection! when in fact it is nearly the most difficult thing that can possibly be attempted, and scarcely ever escapes detection. ‘ St. Paul's contention at Corinth was with unbelieving Jews, who at first "opposed and blasphemed," ‘ and afterwards "with one accord raised an insurrection against him." ‘ Aquila and Priscilla adhered, we may conclude, to St. Paul, throughout this whole contest. (Acts xviii.) It is highly probable they should be involved in the dangers and persecutions which St. Paul underwent from the Jews. As they, though Jews, were assisting to him in preaching to the Gentiles at Corinth. They had taken a decided part in the great controversy of that day, the admission of the Gentiles to a parity of religious situation with the Jews. For this conduct alone, they may seem to have been entitled to thanks from the churches of the Gentiles.' (Paley.)

V. 5. The apostle also desired to be remembered with the same expressions of affection to Epenetus; (for the words greet and salute are the same in the original.) He was peculiarly beloved by the apostle, having been his first convert in Achaia, and the earnest of his subsequent usefulness. Perhaps he was the first of the household of Stephanas, who embraced the Gospel. (1 Cor. xvi. 15.)

V. 6—15. It is not known what Mary this was, or in what respect she had bestowed much labour on the apostle and his friends: but she had in some proper manner been very active in providing for their support and comfort. Andronicus and Junia, being Jews and of the same tribe and family with St. Paul, had on some occasion been imprisoned with him for the sake of the Gospel. They had probably been converted on the day of Pentecost, or soon after; and were well known and esteemed by the other apostles, while Paul had been a persecutor; as they were in Christ, that is, believers, before the apostle was. Of the persons, who are next mentioned, nothing certain is known. Apelles had approved himself to be a true believer by his exemplary zealous conduct. Probably Aristobulus was not a Christian; but he had several in his household, of whom the apostle had some knowledge. Narcissus is supposed to have been a very powerful and wicked man, of whom many things are recorded in the Roman histories; yet he too had believers in his family! Rufus seems to have been the son of Simon the Cyrenian; and his mother had showed such attention to Paul, that he deemed her deserving of the honour and respect due to a parent. It is remarkable, that the apostle, amidst all his engagements, should be so well acquainted with the names and characters of many Christians, residing in a city which he had never visited. This shows his indefatigable diligence and attention to every thing relative to the Churches of the Gentiles. It may also be observed, that he never mentioned the name of Peter, which he doubtless would have done, had he then resided at Rome; which powerfully militates against all the traditions of antiquity respecting him, on which so enormous a fabric of usurpation and superstition hath been erected.

V. 16. A holy kiss. This expression of spiritual affection, to which the apostle exhorted them, to show that his epistle had produced its intended effect in promoting mutual love among them, has been supposed to have been used by men and women separately; yet as it seems afterwards to have been laid aside, because of abuse or slanders, that opinion perhaps is groundless, and rather the effect of modern ideas of propriety, resulting from licentious refinement, than suited to the pure simplicity of those primitive times. The apostle further informed them, that the several Churches of Christ, which he had visited, desired to express their affectionate regard to them.

V. 17—20. Simple. (18.) The word here rendered simple is different from that which is translated simple in the next verse; and conveys the idea of well meaning, though not well informed, persons. The apostle wrote from the fulness of his heart; and therefore, when he seemed to be concluding, his overflowing love induced him to begin again, as some further topic was suggested to his mind. Thus he here interrupted his subject, to warn the Christians at Rome to note, and, as it were, set a mark on, the persons, whose conduct, doctrine, or insinuations, tended to make divisions in the Church, or to stumble or mislead inquirers: and to avoid them, as they would such as were infected with some contagious disease. For, whatever they pretended, they did not serve Christ or seek his glory in what they did: but they rather sought the indulgence of their appetites; and advanced, or zealously contended for, their opinions, in order to support themselves and live in plenty without labour. Thus, by their affectionate and flattering language and plausible harangues, they imposed upon the judgment, and insinuated themselves into the affections, of those persons, who were favourably disposed to hear the Gospel, but were unsuspecting and undiscerning. The apostle was the more earnest to caution the Romans against such artful deceivers; because their unreserved obedience to the will of Christ was every were spoken of with great approbation. He was therefore greatly rejoiced with this good report of them, and wished it to prevail still more; yet he would have them to be obedient from an established judgment, as well as from a proper disposition of heart: he desired that they might be wise and prudent in every good work; and simple and inexperienced only concerning evil, and unacquainted with its painful effects; and so harmless, and inoffensive, according to the exact meaning of the original word. He knew that Satan, who was permitted to bruise the heel of the Seed of the woman, (Note, Gen. iii. 15,) would annoy them to the uttermost; but their reconciled God, the Author of inward and outward peace, would shortly bruise that enemy and all his agents under their feet, and give every believer an entire and final victory over him. He therefore prayed that the pardoning mercy and sanctifying grace of Christ might always be with them.

V. 21—23. (Acts xiii. 1. xvi. 1—3. xvii. 7. xx. 4.) The apostle, not being an expert writer in the Greek language, generally employed an Amanuensis. Tertius, who wrote this epistle, has been supposed to be the same person as Silas or Silvanus; because Silas in Hebrew signifies the Third, as Tertius does in Latin; but this is uncertain. Gaius perhaps was the same person, to whom John addressed his third epistle. Being a man of affluence, he hospitably entertained Paul and his company; and he was so liberal in services of this kind, that he might be called the host of the whole Church. Erastus, as the steward or treasurer of Corinth, must have been a person of considerable rank, who had embraced the Gospel.

V. 25—27. The apostle at length concluded, with ascribing glory to God in such a manner, as to direct the faith and dependence of those whom he addressed to be placed on him. He was aware, that nothing but the almighty power of God could preserve them from the fatal assaults of their subtle and potent enemies. But God was able to establish them in the faith, hope, and obedience of the Gospel, which he had preached to them, in consistency with the doctrine of Christ, respecting the salvation of sinners and the calling of the Gentiles.—This great mystery had been concealed from mankind in general since the beginning, and had only been in part revealed to the Jews; but at length it had been openly manifested, according to the writings of the ancient prophets, and by the accomplishment of them; and by the preaching of the Gospel according to the commandment of the eternal God to his apostles and evangelists: that it might be made known to the nations, in order to deliver them from their idolatries and iniquities, and lead them to the obedience of faith. To this God of infinite wisdom and knowledge, from whom all wisdom originates, all glory and worship ought to be rendered for ever, through his Son Jesus Christ. By the only wise God, we must understand the Deity, without respect to the distinction of persons; or the Father, without excluding the Son or the Holy Spirit; who in many Scriptures are shown to be coequal with the Father in all divine perfections. But as the Godhead is revealed to us in and by the incarnate Word, our divine Mediator, so we must in him see the glory of God, and our adoration and worship must in the same way be presented.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16.

◆

True religion teaches men humbly and frankly to acknowledge their obligations even to those, who in many respects have been their inferiors; and it becometh saints to receive and be helpful to each other for the Lord's sake, as they have opportunity, and to requite the kindness that hath been shown to any of their brethren: and the whole Church is under obligations to those, who venture their lives, or lay themselves out, to preserve or assist the useful servants of Christ. If an apostle so kindly remembered each of those, who had bestowed labour upon him, much more will the Lord remember all the services, which have been performed from love to him and the Gospel. Seniority in faith gives a real precedency; and the bonds of grace are nearer than those of nature. Christ is as much present in the family worship of those who meet in his name, as in the more public assemblies of his saints. Believers are often found in those families, of which the principals are unconverted; and they should perform their several relative duties with cheerfulness and a deference to their superiors, though strangers to the grace of God.

V. 17—27.

◆

In order to maintain uninterrupted our communion with the Lord and with his saints; those persons must be marked, disgraced, and avoided, who aim to prejudice believers against each other, to draw them off from faithful pastors, or to seduce them into strange doctrines contrary to the simple truths of God's word. For notwithstanding their zeal and confidence, as if they only were the servants of Christ, they evidently do not belong to our Prince of peace, but are the slaves of their selfish interests, their sensual appetites, or their ambition. By their apparent affection and compassion, and by their well-worded declamations, they deceive many hopeful injudicious persons; and few are absolutely secured from their plausible delusions. While, therefore, we give Christians merited commendation for their obedience hitherto, we should use every proper means to render them wise to that which is good, and to keep them inexperienced in that which is evil: as well as to encourage them and ourselves with the assurance, that "the God of peace will bruise Satan under "our feet shortly." Every expression of the most endeared affection should be used among believers, but in the most pure and holy manner. They, who honour Christ by showing kindness to his people, will be honoured of him by having their names written in the book of life. True religion does not require men to quit public stations, when they can fill them to the glory of God and the benefit of his Church. Trusting in the power of God to establish us in the faith and hope of the Gospel; thankfully receiving the revelation of the mystery, which was so long kept secret from mankind; endeavouring to make known the Gospel "according to the Scriptures "of the prophets, and the commandment of the everlasting "God;" remembering that we are called to the obedience of faith, and that every degree of true wisdom is from the only wise God: we should endeavour by word and deed to render glory to him through Jesus Christ; that so the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ may be with us for ever. Amen.

THE

CORINTHIANS.

The narrative of the apostle's successful preaching at Corinth, has been considered. (Notes, Acts xviii. 1—18.) But speedily after he left the Church which he founded there, other teachers came among them, who made great pretensions to eloquence, wisdom, and knowledge of their Christian liberty; and thus undermined his influence, and the credit of his ministry. By these means the Corinthians were divided into parties, engaged in eager disputes, and seduced into various irregularities, abuses, and errors. 'It appears, that this letter to the Corinthians was written by St. Paul, in answer to one which he had received from them, (vii. 1.) and that the seventh, and some of the following chapters, are taken up in resolving certain doubts, and regulating certain points of order, concerning which the Corinthians had consulted him.—Though they had written to St. Paul, requesting his answer and directions, in these points; they had not said one syllable about the enormities and disorders, which had crept in among them, and in the blame of which they all shared; but his information concerning these irregularities had come round to him from other quarters,—by more private intelligence. (Paley.) The epistle was therefore written, not only as an answer to the inquiries of the Corinthians by letter; but in order to oppose and terminate the various corruptions in doctrine and practice, which prevailed; to subvert the influence of the false teachers, and to re-establish the apostle's own authority in that Church.' By general truths, he, with great address and prudence, made way for a more direct and particular opposition to the several gross irregularities and dangerous errors, into which they had been seduced. He stated the truth and will of God in various particulars, with great energy of argument and animation of style; he resolved the several questions, that had been proposed to him; he, with great tenderness and wisdom, intermixed exhortations and direction with his other subjects; and he concluded with affectionate and pathetic prayers for them. Though this epistle is not so systematic as the preceding one; yet it is replete with important instruction, and contains the fullest and most interesting declaration and demonstration, of the resurrection of believers, in consequence of the resurrection of their Lord, which is any where to be found. It is most evident, that the epistle was written by the apostle, when residing at, or near, Ephesus, and some time before he left that city. (Note, xvi. 5—9.) Many learned men calculate, that it was written about A. D. 55, or A. D. 57. 'In the ninth year of Claudius, says Orosius, in the tenth, say others, in the twelfth, says Dr. Pearson, the Jews were banished from Rome; and St. Paul coming to Corinth, finds Aquila and Priscilla. (Acts xviii. 2.) He stays there a year and a half;—at Ephesus, three years, and at the close of these three years, he writes this epistle,—according to Dr. Pearson, A. D. 57.' (Whitby.) But this learned writer has allowed no time for the apostle's voyage and journey to Jerusalem, and his progress through the churches of Syria, Galatia, and other parts of Asia Minor; and the same oversight has been fallen into by most of those, whom the author has had the opportunity of consulting, who date the epistle so early. 'A. D. 54. Paul at Corinth, meets with Aquila and Priscilla. A. D. 56. Paul departs from Corinth, and passes to Ephesus; thence he sets out towards Jerusalem,—he lands at Cesarea, goes down to Antioch, and comes into the regions of Galatia and Phrygia, confirming the disciples in all these places. A. D. 57. Paul returns to Ephesus—A. D. 60. About this time a schism ariseth in the church at Corinth, which causeth Paul, (now in or about Ephesus,) to write his First Epistle to the Corinthians.' (Index to the Quarto Oxford Bible, 1794.) The person, who compiled this index, seems to place the writing of the epistle, subsequent to the tumult at Ephesus, which it certainly was not. (Notes, xvi. 5—9. 2 Cor. i. 8—11.) It could not, however, be written long before the apostle left Ephesus; and probably, the index above quoted does not allow too much time for the apostle's progress from Jerusalem to Ephesus. (Note, Acts xviii. 18—23.) This computation, therefore, the author has fixed on, as more satisfactory than any other which he has seen. The epistle contains no express prophecies: but nothing can exceed the decided claim to divine inspiration, which the writer advances. (Notes, ii.) He either therefore claimed what he was not entitled to; or his epistles are not only genuine and authentic, but divinely inspired. (Preface to the Epistles.)

CHAP. I.

The apostle salutes the church at Corinth, 1—3; thanks God for the grace and gifts conferred on them, 4—7; and expresses his assurance of their final salvation, 8, 9. He exhorts them to unity, and reproves their dissentions, 10—16. The preaching of the cross, though foolishness to them that perish, is the power and wisdom of God to the salvation of believers, 17—25. To exclude boasting, God hath not called the wise, the mighty, or the noble; but the foolish, the weak, and those whom man despises, 26—29. Christ is our Wisdom, Righteousness, Sanctification, and Redemption, that we may glory in the Lord alone, 30, 31.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1, 2. (Notes, Rom. i. 1, 2.) There seems to have been a party at Corinth, who depreciated Paul's ministry, and questioned his apostolical authority; it was therefore proper for him to begin his epistle with an express declaration, that God had by his grace and sovereign will called him to that office; and it was conciliatory and condescending to join Sosthenes with him in this salutation and address, as he meant to reprove many evils which had crept in among the Corinthians. It is probable that Sosthenes was one of them, who, having been appointed to the ministry, accompanied Paul in his travels. (Notes, Acts xviii. 12—17.) He addressed the Church of God, or the collective body of Christians, at Corinth, as "sanctified in Christ," which some explain of their having been separated, or set apart for God, in his eternal purpose, as chosen in Christ to be saints or holy persons; others of their being actually sanctified by the communication of his Spirit. With them he also joined all those in every place, who called on the name of the Lord Jesus; (probably with an immediate reference to the other Churches in Achaia;) who was equally the Lord of the apostle, of Sosthenes, and of every believer. This shows us how inseparable the invocation of Christ was to the profession of Christianity in those days. Some would indeed render it, "those, who are called by the name of "the Lord Jesus:" but it may be shown to be inconsistent with the proper construction of the Greek language thus to render it; and probably this interpretation would never have been adopted, if the previous opposition of men's minds to the divine adoration of Christ had not induced them to have recourse to it; though indeed some have contended for it, who by no means questioned the Deity of Christ. 'This in the New Testament is the 'character of a Christian; he is one that calleth on his 'name. That these words ought not to be rendered 'passively, is evident from the Septuagint, who still 'translate the phrase Yikrah beshem, (he shall call on the 'name,) by similar words. (Gen. iv. 26. xii. 8. xiii. 4. 'xxi. 3. Ps. lxxix. 6. xcix. 6. cxvi. 4. Is. lxvi. 1. Lam. 'iii. 55. Zech. xiii. 9.) But when the phrase runs thus, 'Shemka nikrah, (that is, thy name is called on us, or we 'are called by thy name,) they use the passive preterite, 'or first aorist. (Deut. xxviii. 10. 1 Kings viii. 43. 2 'Chr. vii. 14. Is. iv. 1. lxiii. 19. Jer. xiv. 9. xv. 16. 'Dan. ix. 18, 19. Am. ix. 12.) The disciples were first 'called Christians at Antioch. Now before this time we 'find not only Stephen calling on this name, and saying, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit;" 'and St. Paul bid "to "wash away his sins, calling on the name of the Lord:" 'but Ananias speaks to the Lord Jesus of St. Paul, "He hath authority from the high priest to bind all that "call on thy name:" 'and of him it is said, "He de"stroyed them that called on this name at Jerusalem."—

(The original is the same as in this place.) Dr. Hammond, who here translates this phrase passively, doth 'elsewhere translate it actively; the context forcing him 'so to do. So Rom. x. 13, "Whosoever shall call on "the name of the Lord;" 'that is, pray and adhere to 'Christ.' And Acts ix. 14. "He hath authority to "bind all that call upon thy name:" 'that is, saith he, 'that publicly own the worship of Christ.' (Whitby.) (Note, Acts ix. 10—14. Marg. Ref.) To explain the terms sanctified, and saints, as implying no more than the profession of Christianity, and including all nominal Christians, as many learned men do, would enervate the language of the apostles, and confound the distinction between the form and power of godliness, which it is his grand object to maintain. No doubt there were unconverted persons in the several Churches, even in those days: but the apostles addressed their epistles to the collective body, according to their profession; thus teaching them what that profession implied; but if any were not truly saints, they were no more intended, than if they had not been called Christians. The arguments by which these learned writers support their opinion would equally prove, that the worst persons in the Church at Corinth were indeed the temples of the Holy Ghost, the temple of the living God, and entitled to all spiritual and eternal blessings, equally with true believers. (iii. 16. vi. 11. 19. 2 Cor. vi. 16.) 'Even here from the beginning he lays the 'foundation of his future reasoning; for if the Corin'thians and all other believers were called by one God, 'and sanctified in one Christ; if they all had, and owned, 'the same Lord; whence did the dissentions arise and get 'strength among them, as if Christ was divided?' (Beza.)

V. 3. (Note, Rom. i. 7.) 'Is not this to desire for 'them grace and peace from God the Father, and conse'quently to pray for it? Why therefore is it not also to 'desire the same blessings from God the Son?' (Whitby.) and consequently to pray for them?

V. 4—9. Before the apostle entered on the immediate subject of his epistle, he endeavoured to conciliate the affections of the Corinthians, by calling to their recollection the benefits which they had derived from his ministry. He always thanked God on their account, for having bestowed his grace upon them, through Jesus Christ, by which they had been turned from idolatry to the faith of the Gospel and the worship of God. They had also been enriched by him with all spiritual gifts, and miraculously enabled to speak in divers languages, and filled with abundant knowledge of divine things. As the testimony of Christ had been confirmed among them by the miracles of the apostle, they too had been enabled to work miracles after they had embraced it; so that they came behind other Churches in no spiritual gift, before the new teachers came among them. Thus they were preparing themselves and each other, as those who waited for the coming of Christ their Lord and Judge, (Notes, Matt. xxv. 14—30;) who by the continued supplies of his grace would confirm them to the end of their course, in the faith and hope of the Gospel; that they might be preserved blameless in their conduct through life, and stand completely justified and sanctified in the day of judgment. This would certainly be the case, if they were what they professed and appeared to be; seeing God was faithful to his promises and covenant, which he ratified with them personally, when he effectually called them to be partakers of Christ and all his blessings, and to a life of communion with him. Though he afterwards intimated his doubts of some of the Corinthians, yet he here addressed them, as being, in the judgment of charity, what they professed to be. Out of the abundance of his heart he repeats the words, "Our Lord "Jesus Christ," so often, that there is a danger of those readers being disgusted with them, whose hearts are strangers to that holy affection, which occupied that of the apostle. Blameless, &c. (8.) 'He calls them blame'less, not whom none had ever blamed, but those whom 'none could justly blame; that is, those who are in Christ 'Jesus.' (Rom. viii. 1. 33.) (Beza.) Certainly neither spotless innocence, nor sinless perfection, nor such a tenour of conduct from their first profession of Christianity as was wholly unblameable, could be meant; for the apostle blames many things afterwards, that were very general among them; yet their renewal to holiness seems intended, at least equally with their justification; and this in all believers will be perfected in the day of Christ. (Marg. Ref.) 'God will make good his pro'mise, if you do not fail yourselves.' (Hammond.) It seems that the system, which this learned writer adopts, cannot be maintained, without "adding to the word of "God;" for he, and his coadjutors, frequently insert a clause of this kind, as if the inspired writers had forgotten it, and had expressed themselves incautiously! But though all professed Christians at Corinth would not be "kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation," 10 ¶ Now [d] I beseech you, brethren, [e] by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, [f] that ye all speak the same thing, and that there be no * divisions among you; but that ye be perfectly joined together in the same mind, and in the same judgment.

11 For [g] it hath been declared unto me of you, my brethren, by them which are of the house of Chloe, [h] that there are contentions among you.

12 Now [i] this I say, that every one of you saith, [k] I am of Paul; and I of [l] Apollos; and I of [m] Cephas; and I of Christ.

for some were not true believers; yet all those, whom the apostle specially addressed, would; namely, "the saints," even those whom God had "called to the fellowship of "his Son Jesus Christ." (Rom. viii. 30.)

V. 10—16. After this conciliatory introduction, the apostle proceeded to the subject, on which he particularly wrote to the Corinthians; and to point out that leading evil, which gave rise to the other evils which he meant to reprove. He besought and exhorted them by the name, the honour and the authority, of Christ, to cease from murmurings and disputings; that they might all join in the same language of faith, avoid all schisms, contentions, or disunion of heart, and be perfectly united together in the same mind and judgment. Considering the different capacities, educations, habits, and prejudices of mankind, it seems impossible to avoid all difference of opinion: but it is equally true that fallen men will never on earth love God with all their hearts, and their neighbours as themselves; yet the rule and exhortation must not be changed on that account. As we have one rule and standard of truth, and one Spirit to be our Teacher: so, in proportion to our humility, simplicity, and diligence, we come to be of one mind and judgment, in the great concerns of religion: and were we perfect in these things, we should also be perfectly united in sentiment and affection. This will be the case in heaven; and it will at length be so in a great degree on earth. The nearer we come to it, the more we approximate to perfection: all our divisions arise from a sinful cause, which must not be excused; but while it subsists, we should endeavour to bear with each other in respect of it, and so to "keep the unity of the Spirit in the "bond of peace." Yet we should continually pray for the more abundant pouring out of the Spirit of truth and love, on ourselves and all our fellow Christians, that we may be "perfectly joined together in the same mind and judg-"ment." The apostle gave the Christians at Corinth this seasonable admonition; because he had been informed by those, on whom he could depend and whom he did not hesitate to mention, that their Church was troubled with contentions: they were in a divided state; and he might say, that every one of them was attached to some particular teacher in opposition to all others. As if one professed himself to belong to Paul's party, another to that of the eloquent Apollos, another to Peter the great apostle of the circumcision; and as if others professed themselves the disciples of Christ alone, to excuse their disregard for all his ministers! It has been thought with probability, that the apostle does not mention these names, as really the heads of the parties into which the Corinthians had divided: but to show the evil of the thing itself, and the absurdity of dividing the Church, out of a disposition inordinately to honour some particular teacher; or to despise faithful ministers under pretence of honouring Christ. However respectable the names might be which were thus used, the thing was indefensible: but it would give less umbrage for him to mention Apollos and Cephas, than expressly to name the false teachers, who were the authors of the discord. He therefore demanded of the Corinthians, whether Christ and his salvation, or his mystical body, could be thus divided, and one part set in opposition to another? Had Paul, or had any of their other teachers, acquired a right to them by atoning for their sins on the cross? Or had any of them been baptized in the name of Paul, as his disciples, who were in all things without reserve to be devoted to him and honour him? As things had turned out, he was thankful, that he had baptized so few of them; lest his opponents, should have averred that he baptized them in his own name. He could recollect but a few, whom he had baptized; (nor was it necessary that he should be immediately inspired with the remembrance of so immaterial a fact;) the rest had been baptized by others, according to the appointment of Christ, without any mention of the apostle's name in it, as they very well knew.—The word rendered contentions, is properly schisms; and the marginal references will show the reader who understands Greek, the several places in which it is used in the New Testament. The word here evidently signifies divisions or discords, among persons who held the same grand doctrines, and met together for worship in the same grand ordinances. Thus schisms, as the word is here used, differed from heresies, which related to doctrines: yet the meaning varies materially from the modern use of the term.

[d] unto us which are saved, it is the power of God.

19 For it is written, [e] I will destroy the wisdom of the wise, and will bring to nothing the understanding of the prudent.

20 Where [f] is the wise? where is the scribe? where is the disputer of this world? [g] hath not God made foolish the wisdom of this world?

21 For after that, [h] in the wisdom of God, [i] the world by wisdom knew not God, it pleased God by [k] the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe.

22 For [l] the Jews require a sign, and [m] the Greeks seek after wisdom:

23 But [n] we preach Christ crucified, [o] unto the Jews a stumbling-block, and unto the Greeks [p] foolishness;

24 But unto them which are [q] called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ [r] the power of God, and [s] the wisdom of God.

V. 17--19. Some persons, supposing the administration of sacraments to be the most honourable part of the ministerial work, have conjectured several reasons why St. Paul did not baptize the Corinthian converts; but the reason which he assigns entirely subverts these imaginations. Christ did not send his apostle to baptize men in his name, (which outward form might be administered, with equal validity, by those of inferior station and endowments,) but to preach the Gospel, which was a far more important and difficult service. So that he left others to baptize those who embraced the truth. But some of the Corinthians might be ready to think that he was not so competent to preach the Gospel as this statement seemed to imply; and he readily allowed, that he had not used the wisdom of words, or those plausible reasonings, rhetorical flourishes, and arts of oratory, with which they were so fascinated by some teachers. For Christ had sent him to deliver an important message in plain language; and he was aware that such decorations, instead of giving efficacy to his doctrine, would degrade it, and even render "the "cross of Christ of none effect." These studied arts of pleasing would have enervated the solemn affecting subject, and obscured its glory. If, indeed, the preacher did not seek his own honour, in the display of these endowments, he would at least excite men's attention to him, and admiration of him, rather than of his message; and the Holy Spirit would not accompany the word by his new-creating power, when the credit would be given to the instrument rather than to the Agent. In fact, the preaching of salvation for lost sinners, by the ignominious and agonizing crucifixion of the incarnate Son of God, was foolishness to all those who continued in the way to destruction. The sensual, the covetous, and the ambitious, must perceive that it was incompatible with their favourite pursuits; the Pharisee and the moralist would exclaim against it, as needless, and tending to licentiousness. The Scribe, the Sadducee, and the heathen philosopher, would each have his reasons for deriding and reviling it, and the Antinomian would foolishly suppose, that Christ was crucified to procure for him the licence of gratifying his evil propensities. But they, who were brought into a state of salvation by "faith of the operation of God," knew this despised doctrine to be the suitable means, by which the power of God wrought, in pulling down the kingdom of Satan, and converting sinners to himself. And as to the opinion of the wise men of the world, God had declared that he would destroy their wisdom, and bring it to nothing. (Notes, Job v. 13. Is. xxix. 14.)

V. 20--24. (Note, Is. xxxiii. 18.) The wise philosophers, the learned scribes, and the disputers of the world, were in general employed in confuting each others systems: they scarcely agreed in any thing, except in rejecting and despising the Gospel: and it was evident that their wisdom and learning had been of little use to mankind. What indeed had they achieved? What traces of their success, in meliorating the state of the world, could be discovered? And could it be denied, that God had exposed the folly of this kind of wisdom in the most conspicuous manner? In his infinite wisdom, he had left a great part of the world to follow the dictates of their own boasted reason; and the event had demonstrated, that the wisdom of fallen man was incompetent to find out or retain the knowledge of God his Creator; so that idolatry, atheism, or skepticism, was the universal effect. When this experiment had been sufficiently tried, it pleased God to send forth his apostles and evangelists, to preach that doctrine which was derided as foolishness, and they delivered their message in the most artless and unadorned manner; when, behold, most wonderful effects followed! Vast multitudes believed the report, were saved from idolatry and iniquities, and became the worshippers and servants of the living God! The Jewish Scribes indeed, not satisfied with all the demonstrations from miracles and prophecies that Jesus was the Messiah, as not savouring his spiritual salvation, demanded a sign from heaven, and waited for a Messiah who should come with outward observation: and the Greeks wanted a doctrine adapted to their philosophy, and supported by similar reasonings and speculations. But the servants of God "preached Christ "crucified:" this was the grand peculiarity of their doctrine, the centre of their instructions, and the topic with which they enforced all their exhortations. This doctrine of a crucified Messiah; this testimony, that he, who had been put to death by the rulers of the Jews as an impostor, was their long expected Deliverer and King, to whom all subjection was due, and from whom all blessings were to be expected, was a stumbling-stone to the Jews, who took offence at it, and persisted in unbelief: whilst the philosophizing Greeks derided, as the excess of folly, the idea that a Jew, and one whom that nation had crucified with ignominy, should be honoured as the Governor and Judge of all mankind, trusted as the only Saviour from everlasting misery, and even adored as the infinite and almighty God. But all they, whether Jews or Gentiles, who were called according to God's eternal purpose, not only saw the power of God in the miracles by which the Gospel was confirmed, in the resurrection of Christ, and in the accomplishment of ancient prophecies; and his wisdom in the glorious plan of redemption, as harmoniously honouring all the divine perfections and magnifying the divine law: but they experienced Christ to be "the Power and "Wisdom of God," to deliver them from the bondage of sin, and to make them wise unto salvation; and they observed him and his Gospel to be the grand medium, by which the power and wisdom of God were displayed, in the subversion of Satan's kingdom of idolatry and sin, and in confounding all the subtle devices of him and his servants.

V. 25. Those doctrines and dispensations of God, which proud men decried as foolish and weak, were far superior in wisdom, and much more efficacious, than all that men ever could have devised and attempted for the same or similar purposes. Thus the doctrine of salvation by faith in a crucified Jew, which appeared to the carnal mind a foolish device, and the preaching of it by unlearned and obscure persons, which appeared a weak expedient, had, by the power of God accompanying it, done more in a few years towards making men wise and holy, than all the learning of Jewish scribes and Pagan philosophers, or the power of armed legislators, had ever been able to effect, or ever would have effected to the end of time.

V. 26–31. The persons who had been converted to Christianity, and then sent forth to preach the Gospel, were a living demonstration of what the apostle inculcated. This the Corinthians might see for themselves; for as the Gospel had not been preached to them "with "wisdom of words," or with a display of learning and philosophy, so but very few of the sages, politicians, mighty princes, or warriors, or of the noble and honourable of the earth, had embraced it. They had perhaps heard of a few instances of this kind, in whom the omnipotence of divine grace had been displayed. The persons, however, whom God had employed in preaching the Gospel, seem especially intended; and the words, "are "called," which seem to favour the other interpretation, are not in the original. (Marg. Ref.) The apostles and evangelists, and other ministers, whom God had chosen to publish his salvation to mankind, were not in general called to that service from the schools of the learned, from the courts of princes, or from noble families and eminent stations. On the contrary, they were men whom the world counted foolish, because not remarkable for eminent talents, and because destitute of human learning; and, indeed, such persons were selected for this purpose, that by them God might confound the proud reasonings and scornful objections of heathen philosophers and Jewish Rabbies. In like manner he had chosen men of low birth and mean circumstances, unarmed fishermen, tent makers, and others destitute of authority, power, and influence, not renowned for courage and vigour of mind, but gentle and mild in their deportment, that, having endued them with heavenly wisdom and strength, and enabled them to confirm their testimony by stupendous miracles, he might, by their holy lives and heroic constancy, their patient sufferings and successful labours, shame and confound the mighty of the earth. God had even chosen some, who had previously been of immoral characters and disreputable professions, that, being made wise, holy, and useful in the ministry, by his grace and blessing, they might confound and astonish those who formerly counted them even beneath contempt. Nay, he had raised up eminent ministers from among the Gentiles, who, in the proud language and sentiments of the Jews, were considered as scarcely existing in respect of God and religion, that he might by them confound and shame the Scribes, Pharisees, and unbelieving Jews. In short, the Lord had ordered every thing, respecting the conversion of sinners, the preachers of the Gospel, the plan of redemption, and the way of acceptance, in such a manner, as to give no one of the human species any ground of boasting or "glorying in his presence," either in respect of abilities, learning, noble birth, privileges, achievements, moral character, or natural good dispositions, or any other distinction, either before or after conversion. Why then should the Corinthians so value these endowments in their teachers, when God had evidently poured contempt on them? Even that distinction, in which alone they might glory, was not in any respect of themselves. By the sovereign choice and regenerating grace of God, they, sinners of the Gentiles, were in Christ Jesus, who, by his appointment and free mercy was made to all believers the whole of salvation. For they being in themselves ignorant, foolish, guilty, polluted, enslaved, and condemned, Christ was constituted to each of them, “Wisdom,” that by his word and Spirit, and from his fulness and treasures of wisdom and knowledge, they might receive that instruction and counsel, which would render them wise unto salvation, and fit for every service to which they were called; “and Righteousness,” that being justified by his obedience unto death imputed to them, and “made the righteousness of God in him,” they might possess a title to eternal life; “and Sanctification,” that by the power of the Spirit of Christ they might be gradually renewed to his image, and made perfect in holiness, and meetness for their heavenly inheritance; “and Redemption,” that by his power and grace being delivered from the bondage of sin and Satan, they might at length be completely rescued from all remains and traces of this hateful slavery, and be saved from the condemnation and all the consequences of sin, till, by the redemption of the body from the grave, “death itself should be swallowed up in everlasting victory.” Thus, according to the ancient prophecy, (Note, Jer. ix. 23, 24.) they who “gloried, might glory in the Lord,” and in his special favour, all-sufficient grace, and inestimable salvation, though in themselves they had nothing to glory in, but every thing to be ashamed of. Here again the apostle refers to Jesus, “the Lord our Righteousness and Strength,” what the prophet had spoken of JEHOVAH. (Marg. Ref.) ‘They who say, that Christ is made our Righteousness by his righteousness imputed to us, have the same reason to say also, that he is made our Wisdom, by his wisdom imputed to us,’ &c. (Whitby.) There might be some weight in this objection, if this were the only passage of Scripture, by which they, who hold imputed righteousness, support their doctrine, if there were any other passages in the sacred oracles, which even seem to countenance the notion of imputed wisdom, &c. and if the nature of the case were not essentially different. Another may pay my debt, and allow me to receive the wages which he has earned; thus his payment and his labour are set down to my account, or imputed to me for my adequate advantage; but who can have wisdom, health, or liberty, by imputation?' (Notes, Rom. iii. iv.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

The true Church of God comprises all those, in every place, who are “sanctified in Christ Jesus, and called to be saints,” who call on him as “God manifest in the flesh,” for all the blessings of salvation, and who acknowledge and obey him as their Lord, and the Lord of all saints, of all men, and of all creatures; and it includes no other persons. In behalf of all such, we should pray continually for an increase of grace and peace from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ; we should thank God for the grace bestowed on them by Jesus Christ, with an especial remembrance of those with whom we are more immediately connected, and we should rejoice in those gifts, and that knowledge by which the testimony of Christ is confirmed among them. But ministers, with a mixture of authority and affection, should remind their flocks, that an account must be given of all their advantages at the coming of Christ, and call on them daily to wait and prepare for that event. He will confirm his true disciples unto the end; and they may confidently trust in him to preserve them blameless to that day, and to “present them faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy.” But many appear to be Christians, and are endued with useful gifts, who have not been called to the fellowship of Christ; it is therefore highly proper to exhort all who profess the Gospel, to prove the reality of their faith, and the sincerity of their love, and to wait for the coming of their Lord, by watchfulness, diligence, and a careful improvement of their talents. How striking is the contrast, between the language of the apostle in these verses and that of many modern divines! The name of the Lord Jesus Christ was to him the sweetest melody, or “as ointment poured forth;” they seem to fear nothing so much, as a too frequent or too honourable mention of him! and, whatever repetitions they may fall into, they will be sure to offend no man, by too often enlarging upon his dignity and condescension, his love and atoning sufferings, his character and offices, his merits and salvation!

V. 10—16.

Satan hath always endeavoured to stir up strife among Christians, as one of his grand devices against the Gospel; we should therefore use all our influence to prevail with them, by the name and for the honour of our common Lord, to avoid contests of every kind, and as much as possible to speak the same thing, and to be perfectly joined together in the same mind and judgment; and we should persevere in praying for this most desirable harmony. For it must greatly pain every serious and judicious believer, to see or hear of the divisions, which take place, through the spiritual pride, ambition, selfishness, and malignant passions, of turbulent and designing men, and through the prejudices, instability, want of judgment, love of novelty, and eager spirit of some real believers. Thus the Church is divided into parties, congregations are distracted by intestine contentions, and men are drawn away from their faithful pastors, to rank themselves under the banners of some confident deceiver, who “privily brings in damnable heresies,” couched in plausible language, propagated under specious pretences, and varnished over by an ingenuity which might have been better employed. Thus professed Christians become the disciples of men, and, regardless of the apostle’s expostulations, they still glory of God in bringing men to glory, which could not be discovered by any sagacity of man, 6—9; but God by his Spirit had revealed it, 10—13. The natural man cannot receive it, because it is spiritually discerned: but the spiritual man judgeth all things, and is judged of no man, 14—16.

in ranking themselves among the partisans of this or the other preacher, as if Christ were divided! Or as if that teacher whom they extol, while they despise others, had been crucified for them, or they had been baptized in his name, and vowed to be his faithful soldiers unto their lives' end! We should be very thankful, if we have been preserved from giving sanction, or even occasion, to such disgraceful contests; we should carefully avoid all appearance of seeking our own credit, instead of the glory of Christ; and pray continually for "the meekness "of wisdom," that we may know how to counteract the pestilent endeavours of the firebrands of the Church, without giving them any handle or plausible pretence against us.

V. 17—25.

They, whom Christ sends to preach his Gospel, are often incapable, and should never be studious, of "that "wisdom of words," which carnal men admire; nor should the hearers of the Gospel look for such worthless decorations of that divine doctrine, which is most beautiful in its native simplicity. Too often "the cross of "Christ is rendered of none effect," through the vain affectation of the preachers to recommend it by the affected graces of elocution, or the ostentatious parade of learning and philosophy. Thus its edge is blunted, its convincing plainness is obscured, its genuine beauty and glory are tarnished; the preacher has his worthless reward in human applause or useless popularity: but the Spirit of God disdains to set his seal to the word thus preached; it proves the mere shadow of a feast, at which the guests are starved; and an amusing display of ingenuity, instead of an assault on the strong holds of Satan by the power of divine truth. Indeed, all attempts to make the real Gospel palatable to worldly men must be unsuccessful: it always was and always will be foolishness to such as are in the road to destruction; and the only way to render it inoffensive is, to leave out, or slightly touch upon, the offensive parts of it: and this is too commonly done, when preachers study to embellish their doctrine, and recommend themselves, by the wisdom of words or the excellency of speech. But the true minister of Christ is no man-pleaser: he will with great plainness of speech deliver his whole message, however it may be derided or reviled; that by it, as a sure touch-stone, men may learn their real state and character. Thus, while to numbers it appears foolish, to those who are saved it proves the power of God. It is his determination to "destroy the wisdom "of the wise, and to bring to nothing the understanding "of the prudent:" he will not honour carnal weapons, or self-sufficient instruments: he will pour contempt on carnal wisdom; and will abase, either in deep humiliation or final destruction, all the learned scribes, the wise philosophers, and the eager disputers of the world. Such persons are indeed commonly found among the despisers or opposers of the doctrine of Christ crucified: but what have they done towards rendering the world wise and holy? Or what have they to propose so excellent, as to merit a preference to that Gospel which they reject? Undeniable facts evince the folly of this wisdom, and show that, amidst all the displays of the eternal power and God-head with which we are surrounded, human reason and learning know him not, but uniformly lead men to idolatry, impiety, or infidelity: and on the other hand, it hath pleased God, from age to age, by "the foolishness of preaching," (the despised doctrine of salvation by faith in a crucified Saviour, God in human nature, "purchasing the Church "with his own blood,") to save multitudes, even all that believe, from ignorance, delusion, and vice; and to make them meet for his heavenly kingdom. For the true minister of God insists especially upon this great doctrine, which is no less a stumbling-block to some and foolishness to others, at present, than it was in the apostle's days; but which is known and experienced to be the wisdom and power of God to all, who partake of the high and gracious calling of God in Christ Jesus.

V. 26—31.

There is scarcely a stronger demonstration of man's depravity, blindness, and folly, than this circumstance, that neither facts nor arguments can repress his arrogance in treating the wisdom of God manifested in the Gospel as foolishness, the power of God as weakness, though no human devices or efforts have ever produced effects in the least comparable to those, which have been and are wrought by it. Let them then call it folly, enthusiasm, weakness, madness, or what they please; may we show in our lives, that it is a wise, holy, and blessed doctrine, and we shall feel in our hearts, that it gives "a peace of God, "which passeth all understanding." And though we too see that but few of the wise, the mighty, the noble of this world, are called to the knowledge of the truth, or employed to promote the cause of righteousness, yet we perceive also, that God employs the foolish, weak, despised, and base of this world, to confound the devices and expose the folly of the wise, to disappoint the designs of the mighty, and to disgrace and bring into contempt the honourable of the earth; so that in every thing he takes care, that no flesh should glory in his presence. But let us not fear knowing how foolish, guilty, polluted, and enslaved, we are; for by deep convictions of this kind the Holy Spirit leads poor sinners to believe in Christ, who of God is "made to them Wis-"dom, Righteousness, Sanctification, and Redemption:" so that having all in him, they may be satisfied to have nothing as of themselves; and when most covered with shame, filled with deep remorse and self-abhorrence, they may yet "glory in the Lord and his salvation;" and hope to glorify him on earth, and to be preserved as monuments of his love, to praise him for ever in his heavenly felicity.

AND I, brethren, [a] when I came to you, came not [b] with excellency of speech or of wisdom, declaring unto you [c] the testimony of God:

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1, 2. When the apostle came, as a Jewish stranger, among the polite, speculating, and licentious Corinthians, he did not attempt to catch their attention by affected elegancy or sublimity of language, by the trappings of human oratory, or by the speculations of philosophy. For his object was to declare the testimony of God, concerning the only method of salvation from eternal misery, and of obtaining eternal life, and such a message would not admit of these worthless embellishments. Whatever knowledge therefore he possessed, either of Rabbinical or Grecian learning, he determined to keep it out of sight, and to preach, as if he had known no other subject than that of Jesus the Messiah, even him who was crucified, and who was generally desipsed and execrated; and those things that related to redemption for sinners through his blood. This was the centre and substance of his preaching; but it is evident that he did not confine himself wholly to this one topic, so as to exclude other parts of the revealed truth and will of God: for we are sure, from his own writings, that he preached man's relation to God, as his Creator, Benefactor, and Governor: the glorious perfections and the holy law of God; the future judgment and an eternal state of righteous retributions: the lost estate of man, regeneration, repentance, conversion, the necessity of personal holiness, attention to relative duties; and, in short, "the whole counsel "of God," as the great circumference to that circle, of which Christ crucified is the centre, in which all the lines meet. But, upon the most mature deliberation, he had determined to know nothing, even among the refined and philosophical Corinthians, which did not elucidate, recommend, evince, or adorn, this great doctrine of salvation by the cross of Christ. Declaring. (καταγγελλων)—The apostle came as a messenger simply to deliver a message. What extraordinary claims are advanced, what pretensions made in this chapter! How pointed is it upon the subject of inspiration! If the sacred writers were in any degree true men, they were men fully inspired in all which they taught concerning religion. The miracles which they wrought prove them true men, whatever their pretensions might be, and their own words show what these pretensions were.

V. 3—5. In adhering to this determination, the apostle had been deeply sensible of his own weakness and insufficiency, and aware of the predjudices and opposition which he had to encounter: and he was even oppressed with much fear and trembling, lest his infirmity should prevent his success, or disgrace his glorious doctrine. So that he had acted among the Corinthians with much diffidence, modesty, and meekness, and without any thought of making himself the head of a party, as some of their present teachers did. His address and style of preaching had been entirely devoid of "the persuasive words of human wisdom," which often seduced men into error, and enticed them into the views of designing orators, by moving the passions, impressing the imagination, and imposing on the judgment. On the contrary, he left the success of it to be produced entirely "by the demonstration of the Spirit," and the exertion of his divine power. This many expositors understand exclusively of the miracles, by which the Holy Spirit powerfully demonstrated the truth of the Gospel; or the prophecies, which were fulfilled in those things which the apostle preached concerning Jesus and his salvation: but these proofs, however conclusive, without the internal operation of the Holy Spirit, as the Author of divine life in regeneration, would not have produced true faith; and it is unreasonable to confine the expression to those operations which were peculiar to one age, and to exclude such as are alike necessary, and to be depended on, in every age. The annexed reason, however, puts it beyond all reasonable doubt that the latter were principally intended: for the apostle would use no other arts of persuasion, than that plain and faithful address to the hearts and consciences of men, which the Spirit of God always makes use of in convincing them of sin, and in powerfully demonstrating the truth and preciousness of the Gospel to their souls: because he would not have their "faith to stand on the wisdom of men, but on the power of God." Now that faith, which is produced by outward miracles, and wholly rests on them, is no more saving or to be depended on than that which is the effect of logical reasonings or eloquent persuasions: (Acts viii. 13:) but the faith, which is the effect of the inward and powerful teaching and demonstration of the Spirit, rests on the power of God, and is supported by it; and will certainly endure through all trials even to the end.

V. 6—9. Though the apostle disclaimed all pretensions to human wisdom or learning, yet he would not allow his preaching to be really foolishness. Indeed, he and other faithful ministers spake wisdom among those that were perfect; that is, who were so matured in judgment, experience, and spirituality, as to be able to receive it. To such persons they laid open the rich treasures of the wisdom of God, in his method of saving sinners, and in the dispensations of providence; and thus they excited their admiring adoration, and rendered them wise and intelligent in divine things, and, in respect of their true interest and whole duty, far beyond all other persons in the world. If therefore the Corinthians had not been initiated into the depths of this divine wisdom, it was because they were not proper recipients of them. But this wisdom was totally distinct from, and even in many things contrary to, the wisdom of this world, and of its princes and rulers, whose sagacity and policy would not prevent the speedy termination of all their grandeur, and their everlasting ruin, or that of their subjects and flatterers. For it was the wisdom of God as contained in a mystery, even in the mysterious design of glorifying his holy name, and all his perfections, in the redemption of sinners, by the incarnation and atoning sacrifice of his co-equal Son. This was ordained and intended by him before the world began, in order to bring his chosen people to everlasting glory; but it had been entirely hidden from men, except as made known by revelation, and as faith simply received that information. So that the Gentiles, with all their speculations, knew nothing of this wisdom; the unbelieving Jews and their most learned Scribes were wholly unacquainted with it; the old dispensation had only conveyed some general intimations of it, but, the Gospel had now discovered it more fully to all, who were brought to embrace it. Yet none of the princes or great men in the world's estimation had known any thing of it; nay, their policy was diametrically opposite to it; for had Pilate, Herod, Caiaphas, or the Jewish rulers, understood this divine mystery, they would at least, by fear, have been restrained from crucifying the Lord of glory, that divine Person, who, even when he hung upon the cross, was the Lord and King of glory, God in human nature, the Governor and Judge of all the world. Thus the prophecies had been accomplished, and what had of old been written by Isaiah might be applied to the glorious redemption now proclaimed to mankind, and the blessings conferred on and prepared for those who were taught by the grace of the Gospel to love and obey God; and which far exceeded all that had been seen, heard, or thought of, by men. (Note, Is. lxiv. 4.)

V. 10—13. The apostle, and the other preachers of salvation by Jesus Christ, had not discovered the mysteries of divine wisdom by their own superior sagacity; but God had revealed it to them by his Spirit; who not only searched all hearts, but was intimately acquainted with the deep things of God, and all the inmost counsels of his infinite mind. For as no man can penetrate the recesses of another's heart, and know the whole of his thoughts and intentions, in the same way that his own soul is conscious of them, so none can know, discover, or comprehend the things of God, but his own infinite Spirit, who is One with the Father and the Son in the unity of the Godhead, and whose office it is to reveal divine mysteries to his Church. (Matt. xi. 27.) This should be noted as a most decisive testimony both to the Deity and personality of the Holy Spirit. Now the apostles had not received the spirit of the world; they were not actuated by those worldly principles, nor guided by that carnal prudence, of which Satan, "the spirit that worketh in the "children of disobedience," is the concealed author: but they were inspired and actuated by the Spirit of God, that they might know and communicate to the Church the things which God freely bestows on all believers. These they declared, not in such words as carnal wisdom would have suggested, but in simple plain language dictated by the Holy Spirit; which sacred style was formed by comparing one part of divine revelation with another; the spiritual nature of redemption with the holiness of the divine character and law; the former discoveries of the truth and will of God with these later ones; the types and prophecies, with their accomplishment; and the remedy proposed with the state of mankind, and their need of it. Thus their spiritual meditations, discoveries, and affections, under the teaching of the Holy Spirit, led them to use a solemn, energetic, and faithful method of speaking; which accorded to the majesty and importance of their subject, and the style of the sacred oracles, but totally different from the affected oratory or enticing words of man's wisdom. The apostle here undoubtedly speaks of himself as divinely inspired, both in what he preached, and in what he wrote.

for [o] they are foolishness unto him: [p] neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned.

15 But [q] he that is spiritual * judgeth all things, [r] yet he himself is † judged of no man.

V. 14—16. It was not to be expected that the faithful and solemn preaching of the Gospel would please mankind in general, as “the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God.” The term here used hath occasioned much disputation; but as it is derived from a word, that sometimes at least signifies the rational soul, it may be supposed to have reference to the powers of his mind, as well as to his inferior inclinations. ‘It is opposed to the regenerate man, and to the glorified, that is, the perfectly regenerated man. A man that hath only natural abilities and perfections.’ (Leigh.) One that has not the Spirit of God. (Marg. Ref.) The apostle's argument absolutely requires, that by “the natural man” we understand the unregenerate man, however sagacious, learned, or abstracted from sensual indulgences; for he opposes him to the spiritual man, and the pride of carnal reasoning is at least as opposite to spirituality as the most grovelling sensuality can be. No man, as naturally born into the world, and not supernaturally born again of the Spirit, “can see the kingdom of God,” or receive in faith and love the spiritual mysteries of redemption by the cross of Christ. To all unregenerate men, these things will in one way or other appear foolishness, irrational, uninteresting, unnecessary, inconsistent or absurd; and doubtless proud reasoners have scoffed at them more than ever mere sensualists did. No ingenuity, address, or reasoning of the preacher can prevent this effect; no application of the man's own mind, except in humble dependence on the teaching of the Holy Spirit, can enable him to perceive the real nature and glory of them. For they are “spiritually discerned,” that is, by the illuminating and sanctifying work of the Spirit of God upon the mind; by which a spiritual capacity is produced, that discerns, admires, loves, and delights in the divine excellency of heavenly things. When this change has taken place, and a man's spiritual senses have been matured by growth and exercise, he may be called “a spiritual man;” and he perceives the spiritual glory and excellency of every truth and precept of the word of God; he distinguishes one object from another by a spiritual taste, or a kind of extempore judgment, and so he becomes a competent judge in such matters. Yet his views, principles, and motives, fall not under the judgment of any other men: none of them are competent to decide on the propriety of his conduct, as they are strangers to those views and discoveries which direct his determinations. For what natural man hath understood the mind of the Lord, that he should be able to instruct him who is under the tuition of the Holy Spirit? As therefore the apostle and other inspired persons were made acquainted with the mind of Christ, by whom the Father reveals himself to men; so none of their self-appointed judges could be competent to decide, either upon their doctrine, or their manner of communicating it. They were above such instructors or censurers, who could not possibly understand the principles on which they acted. In a measure, all spiritual men “have the mind of Christ,” and natural men are incompetent judges of their conduct; yet this is in every thing to be tried by the word of God, and nothing must be justified or excused, which does not accord with that rule, when properly explained. But the inspired apostles were employed to state that mind of Christ, by which men's principles and actions must be judged; and in this respect they could not be liable to be judged by any man. Some indeed explain the last verse as an inquiry, whether any man had so known the mind of the Lord, as to be competent to give him any counsel or instruction? (Notes, Rom. xi. 34—36.) But the context rather fixes the meaning to the preceding interpretation; and the apostle intended to expose the absurdity of a carnal man presuming to instruct a spiritual man in respect of spiritual things, or of an ordinary Christian or teacher presuming to censure or dictate to an inspired apostle, as he thus declared himself to be. It is probable that the apostle had in mind the words of the prophet Isaiah, but he does not expressly quote them. (Notes, Is. xl. 12—17.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

How surprising is it, that this most honoured servant of Christ should be constrained to justify his excellent and useful preaching, even to the very persons who had been converted by it! But this surprise should be connected with a pleasing admiration of the divine wisdom, in taking occasion from that circumstance to give the Church most valuable instructions concerning the best method of declaring the testimony of God to sinners. This wants no excellency of speech or of wisdom to enforce it, but appears most venerable, when the witness for God is regardless of human applause or censure; when his whole soul is occupied by zeal for the honour of his Lord, and compassion for the souls of perishing sinners; when he is willing, even among the learned and polite, to be counted ignorant in other respects; when he determines “to know nothing but Christ crucified,” and the gracious message which he is sent to deliver in his name. But if this arduous service made even St. Paul to fear and tremble through conscious weakness, what reason have we to be humble and diffident, when called to declare the same testimony to mankind! How should we fear disgracing this honourable ministry by our own folly or sin! At what a distance should we keep from all ambition and self-confidence! How carefully should we remember that all our sufficiency is of God alone! Such humility and meekness adorn and give dignity to that holy constancy and boldness, with which we must plead the cause of God; and a realizing sense of eternal things, of the worth of souls,

CHAP. III.

The apostle shows, that he could not instruct the Corinthians in the deeper mysteries of the Gospel, because they were carnal, 1—3; as appeared from their dissentions, 4. All ministers are servants to one Lord, 5; who employs them in cultivating his field, and in building his church, 6—9. The apostle had laid the only true Foundation, and others must take care what they build on it: for their work would be tried as by fire, 10—15. Christians are the temple of God, and must not be defiled, 16, 17. Worldly wisdom is foolishness with God: and none ought to glory in men; for all things belong to true believers, 18—23.

the danger of ungodly men, the preciousness of Christ, and the importance of our message, will counteract our natural propensity to trifling, or to an affectation of "the "enticing words of man's wisdom." The more deeply we are convinced, that no arguments or eloquence of man can by their own efficacy produce saving faith, the greater care we shall take to speak in a plain, serious, and scriptural manner, and in imitation of those preachers of old, whose word was attended with "demonstration of the Spirit and of power;" depending singly on his effectual operation to bring our hearers to believe, to the salvation of their souls. The maxims of human wisdom, whether philosophical or political, will soon come to nought, and sink into contempt. But experienced believers are shown such glorious displays of wisdom, as eclipse all that they before admired, even as the rising sun obscures the glimmering lamp. The things which God ordained before the world, in order to bring his chosen people to glory, are such as "angels desire to look into:" they give the humbled and enlightened mind such views of God, and his perfections, works, and ways, as fix it in astonishment, excite it to adoration, inspire it with love and gratitude, raise it above this earthly clod and all its puny concerns, and enlarge it into the most exalted, holy, yet humble, ambition after true honour and greatness. But this wisdom must still be hidden from the proud, the carnal, and the unbelieving, notwithstanding the fulness and clearness with which it is revealed in the Gospel. The same principles, which influenced the princes of the world to crucify the Lord of glory, still possess the minds of men in general: and avarice, sensuality, or carnal ambition, still despise those good things, which "God hath prepared for them that "love him," though they pass man's understanding, and infinitely excel in glory and value whatever he hath seen, heard, or imagined.

V. 10—16.

No man truly understands, or properly values, divine revelation, except that divine Spirit, who "searcheth all "things, even the deep things of God," and who revealed them to the apostles, removes the veil from his heart, and enables him to perceive their real excellency. On this great Teacher we must simply depend, while we seek to know the things that are freely given by God" to his people, and to obtain the assurance that we belong to that favoured company. If indeed we are delivered from the spirit of the world, and are taken under the guidance of the Spirit of God, we shall more and more regard the words of the sacred Scriptures; and, comparing spiritual things with spiritual, our holy discernment will increase, and we shall acquire a faculty of speaking on religious subjects, in language suited to their divine nature and infinite importance. But whoever teaches, or what language soever is employed, the natural man will either oppose, despise, or abuse the things of the Spirit of God: he cannot cordially receive or rightly understand them: they will remain foolishness to him, because he wants a spiritual discernment. On the other hand, he who is born of God, however ignorant or illiterate, will become spiritual, and so capable of discerning the harmony and glory of divine truth: he will experience its sanctifying effects in his heart, and produce correspondent fruits in his life. His judgment and conduct will be formed upon the word of God; and they, who presume to judge, condemn, or deride him, for violating the maxims of carnal wisdom, will only show their own ignorance and arrogance. They cannot instruct him in spiritual things by their carnal reasonings, and they have not known the mind of the Lord Jesus, or they would not condemn him for acting according to it: and they can no more argue him out of his principles, experience, hope, or duty, than a man with good eyes could be convinced that there is no light from the sun, or that light is neither pleasant nor profitable, by the ingenious sophisms of a man that hath been blind from his birth.

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1—3. Some of the Corinthians had been seduced into a mean opinion of the apostle's ministry, because he had not fully instructed them in those deep points of doctrine, on which their other teachers had particularly insisted, and about which they speculated: he therefore here assigns the reason of his conduct in this respect. Though they had been plenteously endued with supernatural gifts and knowledge, yet he had observed those things in their disposition and conduct, which rendered it improper for him to speak to them as to spiritual

4 For while one saith, [h] I am of Paul; and another, I am of Apollos; are ye not carnal?

5 Who then is Paul, and who is Apollos, [i] but ministers by whom ye believed, [k] even as the Lord gave to every man?

6 [l] I have planted, [m] Apollos watered; but [n] God gave the increase.

7 So then, [o] neither is he that planteth any thing, neither he that watereth; but God that giveth the increase.

8 Now [p] he that planteth, and he that watereth, are one: [q] and every man shall receive his own reward, according to his own labour.

men, who were competent to receive the deeper discoveries of divine wisdom: and thus he was constrained to address them "as carnal, even as babes in Christ." For though he looked on them in general as sincere converts, and thus in a measure spiritual, yet, even till he left them, they were so far from maturity of judgment and experience, and so prone to carnal passions, that he deemed it incumbent on him "to feed them with milk," as the nurse does the infant, "and not with strong meat," which they could not digest. The simplest truths of the Gospel, respecting the sinfulness of man and the rich mercy of God, regeneration, repentance, and works meet for repentance, faith in our Lord Jesus Christ, the necessity and nature of holiness, the influences and fruits of the Spirit, the day of judgment, and eternal happiness and misery, delivered in the simplest plainest language, suited them far better than those deeper mysteries, which led to mere speculation, and which afforded the teacher a fairer opportunity of showing his knowledge, ingenuity, and capacity. On these the apostle did not much insist, because he knew the Corinthians could not bear them, but that such instructions would feed their carnal passions, instead of their faith and love. Indeed, though a considerable time had since elapsed, they were not yet able to receive, and make a good use of, these sublimer truths, because they were still under the influence of carnal principles. This needed no other proof than their well-known conduct: for while they envied one another, the gifts which God had bestowed on them, and with emulation sought their own credit in the exercise of them, while there subsisted eager contentions and lamentable divisions among them, could they deny that they were carnal, and acted more like the men of the world, in their competitions and contests for honours and distinctions, or for the interest of a party, or the credit of a favourite orator, or philosopher, than like spiritual men? The principles and affections of the natural man were more prominent in their conduct, than the humble, meek, loving, and peaceable dispositions, which spring from regeneration. (Marg. Ref.) It is evident, that by carnal, and as men, the apostle does not here intend the prevalence of sensual appetites, but that of malignant passions; not the propensities of the animal, but those of the fallen spirit: and this may confirm us in the interpretation given of this and similar words in other places. As spiritual is opposed to carnal, it must relate exclusively to the sanctifying grace of the Holy Spirit, and not at all to miraculous endowments. The Corinthians were enriched with the latter; but some of them seemed altogether destitute of the former, and the generality of them were but babes in Christ.

V. 4—9. The apostle still cautiously forbore to mention the false teachers, who had done the mischief. Even if Paul and his beloved brother Apollos had been set up for the heads of the contending parties, the contests of the Corinthians would have proved them to be carnal. For who were Paul and Apollos? Not lords over God's heritage, but ministering servants to them for Christ's sake, by whose labours they had been brought to believe the Gospel, according to the gift of God, both to the ministers, and those converted by them. 'For what reason do you 'regard either the one or the other? Is it on no con'sideration but that of talents, which they have in com'mon with many who are strangers to the Gospel? Or 'ought it not to be in a different view? even because they 'are the ministers of Christ, &c.' (Doddridge.) Indeed Paul had been sent to enclose and plant the Lord's vineyard at Corinth; and when he had done this, Apollos had followed him to water it: but God alone had given the increase, and made the plants to grow and become fruitful. 'The power of growing, in this sacred agriculture, is 'neither by nature in the plants themselves, nor inserted 'by the diligence of the cultivator; but it springs entirely 'from the grace and efficacy of the Holy Spirit.' (Beza.) So that neither of the instruments were any thing in comparison with the great Agent. 'Not that their labour is 'vain; for faith comes by hearing: but first, God does 'not use their ministry, because he needs either it, or 'them, or is unable to do without them: again, they 'could not perform what they do, unless God of his 'mere mercy had constituted them his labourers. But, 'especially, because all their work is external, God alone 'claiming to himself exclusively all that is inwardly done 'in man's salvation: that his Restorer unto life eternal 'may be one and the same, who was his Creator to this 'present life.' (Beza.) Yet both the ministers were as one; both acted as servants in the same work, and with the same intention of glorifying God, by seeking the salvation of souls: and they would each receive a gracious reward from their common Master, who was the only competent Judge of their faithfulness and diligence. For they were fellow-labourers of God: while the Church at Corinth was his husbandry, in which he employed and wrought by them; it was "God's building," which he was erecting by their means, according to his own plan, for his own glory, and to be his holy temple: and they did the work which he set them to, and no more.

10 According [u] to the grace of God which is given unto me, [x] as a wise master-builder, [y] I have laid the Foundation, [z] and another buildeth thereon. [a] But let every man take heed how he buildeth thereupon.

11 For [b] other foundation can no man lay, than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ.

12 Now if any man build upon this Foundation, [c] gold, silver, [d] precious stones, [e] wood, hay, stubble;

13 Every [f] man's work shall be made manifest: for [g] the day shall declare it, because * it shall be revealed by fire; [h] and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is.

14 If [i] any man's work abide which he hath built thereupon, he shall receive a reward.

V. 10—15. Thus far the apostle proceeded on the supposition, that the labourers were skilful and faithful; but he meant to lead the attention of the Corinthians to some who were not so: therefore he declared, that, according to the grace bestowed on him, (to which all the glory was due,) he had laid the Foundation of "God's "building" among them, like a wise architect; and he knew that it was capable of supporting the whole weight of the intended superstructure. But since he had left Corinth, another had builded on his Foundation; nay, several had been employed in that work: but let every one of them take heed with what materials, and in what manner, they carried on the building. He knew that no man could lay any other foundation of a spiritual temple, for the glory of God, or for the sinner's hope of salvation, than what he had laid in his preaching, and which God had laid in his purpose and by the Gospel; namely, the Person, mediatory office, righteousness, atonement, intercession, and grace of the Lord Jesus Christ. If any man pretended to lay any other foundation than this, he could not be considered as the minister of God, "a worker "together with him." It was not therefore to be supposed, that this was the case with any of their teachers. Yet even on this Foundation very different materials might be builded: some might carry on the work with gold, silver, and valuable stones; others with wood, hay, or stubble: some, who preached the doctrine of salvation by faith in Christ, would instruct believers from the word of God in all the precious truths of the Gospel; show them their obligations and duties; and teach them to evidence their faith by spiritual worship and holy obedience. Others might substitute false doctrines, human inventions, abrogated ceremonies, and philosophical speculations, or deduce licentious inferences from the doctrines of grace. (Marg. Ref.) Thus the building would be deformed and weakened by such additions and base materials, as would never stand the trial which was appointed. For the time was coming, when the nature and value of every man's work would be made manifest, the day of judgment would openly declare it. The materials of this spiritual building, and every man's work in it, must be tried as by fire, during the discoveries of that solemn season. This will prove them of what sort they are: the gold, silver, and precious stones, will stand the fire, and even be purified by it; and he that hath built with such materials will receive an abundant reward; but the wood, hay, and stubble, will be burned, and he that hath spent his time and labour in building with such worthless materials, will suffer great loss, even in respect of the degree of his future glory: yet, provided he is indeed fixed on the good Foundation, he shall finally be saved; but it will be, as a man is preserved from the flames of his house, when he escapes naked through them, and so narrowly saves his life with the loss of all his property. So extremely dangerous is it to teach false doctrines, even in connexion with fundamental truths! The absurdity of the papists, in producing this passage in favour of their doctrine of purgatory, is very obvious: but it is to be feared, that the zealous abettors of that doctrine, and many others of a similar nature, will be found to build wholly without a foundation. (Notes, Matt. vii. 24—27.)

V. 16, 17. This metaphor of a building led the apostle to inquire, whether they did not know, that they were the spiritual temple of God, who dwelt in them by the Holy Spirit given unto them. Now, if any man defiled or profaned the temple of God, he would be exposed to his indignation, and might expect the most terrible destruction; because of the holiness of the temple, as consecrated to God. (Marg. Ref.) It would therefore be extremely dangerous for any one, by false doctrines or a licentious example, to defile the Church, or any of its members: and if their teachers were chargeable with such crimes, they would have reason to fear the severest judgments of God; and would be presumptuous in expecting to be saved even as by fire. (Marg. Ref.) 'They are 'said by the apostle to defile the temple of God, who 'corrupted the purity of the Gospel by carnal eloquence, 'and who rent the Church by factions.' (Beza.) 'The 'like words used, (vi. 16—19,) by way of dehortation 'from fornication; and (2 Cor. vi. 16.) from communion 'with heathen, in their idolatrous rites and heathen prac'tices; and by way of inducement to "cleanse ourselves

"from all filthiness of flesh and spirit," (2 Cor. vii. 1;) 'more naturally incline us to refer these verses to the corrupting of the temple of God, by uncleanness and fornication, or by idolatrous practices; both which the Corinthians did.' (Whitby.) It does not, however, appear, that there is any necessity of confining the interpretation to this or the other kind of defilement: and in proportion as the declaration is made general, it becomes more and more important. The verb, rendered destroy, is the same with that before translated defile. The Jews polluted the temple of God by their crimes, and were given up into the hands of their enemies as polluted, to be destroyed by them: and part of the awful doom of the wicked is thus expressed, "He that is filthy, let him be filthy still."

V. 18—23. 'The Corinthians were induced to eat things offered to idols, in the idol-temples, by men pretending to great knowledge. (viii. 1, 2.) They also introduced among them the doctrine of the lawfulness of fornication. (v. 1.) These teachers seem to have been the Nicolaitans, who received their doctrine from the philosophers.' (Whitby.) However this may be, the persons more immediately concerned in the preceding warning would probably despise it, especially from one whom they disregarded, as far beneath them in knowledge and wisdom: but let them not deceive themselves in this matter; if any of them appeared to be wise in this world, instead of trusting to such a distinction, let him become a fool in his own opinion and that of worldly men; as this would be absolutely necessary, in order to his being made wise unto everlasting life. For God accounted this world's wisdom to be folly; he ensnared the worldly-wise in their own politics, and he knew their reasonings and imaginations to be vain and worthless. (Notes, Job v. 12—14. Ps. xciv. 10, 11.) Let therefore none glory in men, as if some eloquent, learned, or sagacious leader were a great honour to them, and they might value themselves on their relation to him: whereas all things were theirs if indeed they were believers: the abilities, gifts, and services, of apostles and ministers were intended for their benefit; the world and every thing in it belonged to them, as far as it could do them good; its possessions would be given them, if really profitable; its enmity would discipline them for heaven; and all providential appointments would promote their sanctification: life would be ensured to them, till their work was done and they were ripe for their reward; death, at the appointed hour, would come as their friend to deliver them from sin and sorrow, and convey them to their Father's mansions: present comforts and trials would concur in promoting their advantage; and the future judgment and its eternal consequences would be altogether in their favour. Thus all things were theirs, even as much as if the whole property of the creation had been vested in them: seeing they belonged to Christ, the Heir of all things, and were one with him, his chosen and redeemed people, the members of his body, his beloved, the trophies of his victories, and the jewels of his crown; and as "Christ is God's," his beloved Son, his appointed Surety, the Brightness of his glory, and the grand Medium of displaying all his perfections in the sight of all worlds, and to all eternity. These were truly honourable distinctions; and they ought to recollect, that, by glorying in men, they acted inconsistently with their relation and obligations to Christ, to whom alone they should unreservedly devote themselves.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

Ministers should suit their instruction to the state and wants of their hearers; and teach them such things, as more immediately tend to their edification, rather than insist continually on those subjects, which are agreeable to the inclinations of any party. Babes in Christ must be fed with milk, and not with strong meat: many doctrines, which they may hereafter feed upon, would at present be useless or pernicious; because they are not able to perceive their tendency, or their harmony with other truths. Men may have much doctrinal knowledge, and yet be mere beginners in the life of faith and experience: nay, their fondness for speculations, and their acuteness in them, may prove them to be in a great degree carnal, and but imperfectly grounded in the first principles of experimental and practical religion. Thus many professed Christians, and preachers too, show themselves to be yet carnal, by their vain-glorious emulations, their eagerness for controversy, their selfish fiery zeal, their disposition to prefer and exalt themselves, and to despise and revile others; and their apparent delight in disturbing the peace of the Church. This is the tendency of sin, not of grace; the temper of the carnal, the natural, and not of the spiritual man: and we need much of that "love which hopeth all things," to suppose that such wranglers have any spirituality, or are even babes in Christ. It is, however, an universal rule, that these dispositions are proportionably proofs, that the carnal mind of worldly men is prominent and prevalent: and while so many are saying, "I am of Paul, and I of Apollos;" we may

CHAP. IV.

The apostles and preachers of the Gospel, should be accounted of, as servants to Christ, and stewards of the mysteries of God: and they are required to be faithful, 1, 2. They must be left to the judgment of the Lord at his coming, 3—5. The apostle exhorts the Corinthians not to be puffed up for one against another; as all have their different endowments from God, 6, 7. He contrasts their vain-glory with his own despised and afflicted state, and lowly conduct, 8—13. He warns them, as their only father in Christ, and exhorts them to imitate him, 14—16. For this purpose he had sent Timothy unto them, 17; and intended to come himself, and make trial of the power of those who opposed him, 18—21.

fairly demand of them, whether they be not carnal. For what are the most able ministers but servants of Christ and of his people? They do not come in their own name, or about their own business; they seek not their own glory; sin and folly are all that they have of their own, and their wisdom and grace are wholly from the Lord. By his help they may plant and water; but he alone can give the increase: so that they are nothing, and he only must be considered as the object of adoring love and gratitude. Faithful ministers are afraid of receiving undue honour: though their rank and abilities may differ, they are all one; they are engaged in the same work, and aim at the same object: they are fellow-labourers of God, in his spiritual husbandry and building; and he will graciously reward the services, which, by his grace, they have performed. Indeed, all those, who, in their several places, labour by scriptural means to promote the cause of true religion, are "workers together with God:" but all ungodly men, especially persecutors, false teachers, seducers, tempters, and such as employ their ingenuity in disseminating infidelity, impiety, and licentiousness, are fellow-workers with the devil, in rendering others wicked and miserable, and their recompense will be proportioned to their zeal, diligence, and success.

V. 9—15.

It is a great comfort to the minister of Christ, when, on reflection, he is humbly conscious of having, like a wise master builder, laid a right Foundation: but every one should also take heed what he buildeth upon it. For while many attempt in vain to substitute some other foundation, in the stead of Christ, and so perish with their deluded followers, there are also numbers, who lay the right Foundation, and yet build worthless rubbish upon it, to their own great loss and danger, and to the great detriment of their hearers. In expectation therefore of that solemn day, when every man's work shall be manifested and tried as by fire, we should now be careful to build with approved and precious materials: we should avoid superstitious inventions, unscriptural doctrines, enthusiastical delusions, and philosophical speculations, as well as a variety of trifling inquiries and disputations, about which many, who seem to lay the right Foundation, waste their time and lose their labour, while they injure the building and endanger their own souls. We should bestow pains to procure gold, silver, and precious stones, for this work; that by sound doctrine and scriptural instructions we may build up the souls of believers in knowledge, hope, love, and obedience; that by our labours, example, and prayers, they may grow up a holy temple to the Lord; that so our work may abide the trial, that we may receive a full reward, and have an abundant entrance into the everlasting kingdom of Christ. It is then peculiarly incumbent upon ministers, in all their studies, pursuits, sermons, publications, and conversation, to recollect that their work must be tried by fire; to anticipate the sentiments, which the day of judgment will obtrude upon them, concerning their present occupations; and to reflect on the irreparable loss of spending their time of service to no purpose, or perniciously; to consider the tendency of their undertakings, to compare them with the word of God, and to judge themselves, that they may not be judged of the Lord. For if shame and sorrow could enter heaven, surely the minister, whose work shall be burned, yet he himself saved as through fire, would be overwhelmed with them!

V. 16—23.

When faithful admonitions have no effect on men's minds, their state is very awful. It is proper, however, to warn them, with all solemnity, concerning the guilt and danger of defiling the temple of God by their false doctrines and bad examples. Many of them will indeed despise the warning, and deceive themselves. The reputation of being wise in this world is no favourable evidence of a man's character; as the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God, who takes the wise in their own craftiness, and exposes the vanity of their counsels and speculations. It cannot therefore be too earnestly inculcated on all, to cease from their own wisdom, and to be willing to think themselves fools, and to be thought so by others, that they may become wise by the teaching of the word and Spirit of God. But we should all remember that true Christians are the temple of God, who dwelleth in them by his sanctifying Spirit: and they, who know not this, can hardly be thought even babes in Christ. If we are conscious of this spiritual consecration to God, to be his living temples, let us be careful to have our sacred character adorned by a holy conversation, and to avoid whatever may defile either ourselves or our fellow Christians. And surely he is deceived, who deems himself the temple of the Holy Spirit, and yet is unconcerned, or but little concerned, about personal holiness, or about the peace and purity of the Church. If indeed we are the children of God, we have something nobler to glory in, than in men, and our relation and attachment to them: for, all things are ours, apostles, prophets, ministers, ordinances, providential dispensations, earth, heaven, life, death, things temporal, and things eternal; because we are one with Christ, and his purchased and redeemed people, and he is One with the Father: so that, as the glory of God is displayed in Christ his Son, our salvation is secured in Christ our Head, who will cause us to sit down as conquerors through him "upon his throne, even as he hath "overcome, and hath set down with his Father upon his "throne."

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1. Lest the Corinthians should suppose, from what the apostle had said, that little respect or affection was due to their ministers, he here showed them in what estimation they ought to hold them, and by what measure they ought to regulate their regard to them. Whether they were apostles, evangelists, or ordinary teachers, they were to consider them, not indeed as lords, but as the ministering servants of Christ for their benefit, in the highest and most important offices; even as the stewards of the mysteries of God; that, as his immediate representatives, they should, by his authority, preside in his family, take care of his interests and honour, instruct and direct the services of their brethren, and give every one his portion in due season. (Note, Matt. xxiv. 45.) Thus they were intrusted with the mysterious and sublime truths of the Gospel, that they might preach them to the people, and apply them with suitable admonitions, exhortations, encouragements, and warnings, as every one's case required, in order to the conversion of sinners, and the establishment and edification of believers. Some, by the mysteries of God, understand also the administration of the sacraments, which were commonly called mysteries by the fathers; but though this is a part of the minister's work, yet the external ordinances are not called mysteries in Scripture; and this name, afterwards given them, helped to lead men to form a wrong judgment concerning them. It was, however, well known, that exact fidelity was the most essential qualification required in a steward: a man of strict probity, attached to his master's interest, and impartial in his conduct towards his fellow servants, might be a valuable steward, though his accomplishments were but moderate; but nothing could compensate for the want of faithfulness. Thus a minister, who uprightly and simply sought the glory of God and the good of souls, and who impartially dispensed the truths of God, without respect of persons, or regard to his own interest, honour, ease, or indulgence, would be accepted by the Lord, and ought to be valued by believers, though not so eminent in natural endowments, or even in spiritual gifts and attainments, as others were, who sought themselves in their admired ministrations.

V. 2—5. The apostle counted it a very small matter, compared with the acceptance of his gracious Lord, what judgment the Corinthians, or any man, formed of him; whether they supposed him to be faithful, or not; or whether they were offended with him for his faithfulness, and despised him because he had not come with excellency of speech or of wisdom. Indeed, he did not rely on his own judgment concerning himself; because he was aware of the deceitfulness of the human heart, (which their self-confident teachers ought more deeply to study:) for though he was not conscious of any unfaithfulness or self-seeking in his ministry, yet this was not sufficient to justify him before God, who often saw that evil in the heart which pride hid from the man himself. He therefore sought to the Lord to judge him, and so waited for that day when he must appear before his tribunal. (Note, iii. 10—15.) But knowing that many of them were disposed to judge unfavourably of him, through the artifices of their seducers; he exhorted them not to judge such matters before the time, but to leave them, till the Lord should come to judgment, when characters and actions would appear in another light than they then did. For he would both discover the secret sins of men's lives, which they had veiled in darkness from the view of their neighbours; and disclose the motives and intentions, which lay concealed in the impenetrable recesses of the heart; and which would in many instances appear to be designing, ambitious, and selfish, when a man's words and works were most specious and plausible. Then the faithful steward would be proportionably honoured, with the commendation of God himself, which would abundantly counterbalance the contempt and reproach of men; but it must be a day of detection and confusion to all hypocritical, ambitious, and self-seeking teachers, however admired and extolled. 'Hence note, that Jesus Christ must have the knowledge 'of the secrets of the hearts of all men subject to his 'judgment; and so must be that God, who alone knows 'the hearts of all men. (Whitby.) (Marg. Ref.) 'This 'saying of Paul,' ("Judge nothing before the time,") 'must be restrained to a certain hypothesis: for both the 'spirits are to be tried, and we ought to "judge our-"selves whether we be in the faith." 'The apostle does 'not even condemn the private judgments of charity; and 'much less either civil or ecclesiastical polity. For he is 'not properly discoursing about the examination of men's 'doctrine or manners; but rather concerning the estimate ‘ that is to be made of each person by men, which, says he, the Lord will at last judge. Finally, when he says that he “ knew nothing by himself,” it must be referred to the subject of which he was treating, namely, the ministerial office, which he testifies he had fulfilled among the Corinthians with so good a conscience, that he could not charge himself with any fraud or negligence. This wonderfully suited both those teachers, who seemed to themselves so excellent in comparison of Paul, and these hearers, who, (like the persons who sat in the theatre, in order to confer the crown on the best performer, so boldly extolled or depressed whom they would. But indeed, says Paul, I cannot pronounce concerning myself, in that manner which ye do concerning me and others.’ (Beza.) (Note, 2 Cor. i. 12—14.) ‘ This only forbids our censures of things uncertain, of which no righteous judgment can be passed. This appears both from the words and the occasion of them. From the words, for they respect “ the hidden things “ of darkness,” and “ the counsels of the heart.” From the occasion of them, they passing their censures on St. Paul, and questioning his fidelity in his office, of whom they had no authority so to judge, nor occasion so to judge.’ (Whitby.)

V. 6, 7. In speaking of those who had been considered as heads of different parties at Corinth, the apostle had chiefly mentioned himself and Apollos; and thus, to avoid giving offence, he had, as by a figure, transferred the case from those who were really concerned, to persons whom he could not be thought disposed to undervalue, that in them the teachers might learn not to be wise in their own conceits, and the people not to think too highly of men, calling them masters, or glorying in being their disciples, and thus esteeming them as something more than servants or stewards, or above what he had written according to the word of God, and on other accounts than because of their faithfulness. Indeed both they and the teachers, (whom they placed in competition with each other, and about whom they were puffed up,) should inquire who had made them to differ, either in spiritual gifts, or even by converting grace, from their idolatrous neighbours or their fellow Christians. Was this difference the effect of their superior merit, docility, or goodness? What had they, which they had not received as free gifts, or as talents committed to their stewardship? Why then did they glory in them, and boast of them, as if they had been the independent authors of those endowments, by which they were distinguished from others, and were authorized to employ them to their own glory or advantage, without being accountable to God for them? Surely, such self-exaltation must be most absurd, abominable, and sacrilegious. It is evident, that the apostle is here more immediately speaking of natural abilities and spiritual gifts, and not of special and efficacious grace. Yet if we all are by nature entirely depraved, if we must be born again, and new created, if it “ is God that worketh in us to “ will and to do of his good pleasure,” and if “ by grace “ we are saved through faith, and that not of ourselves, “ it is the gift of God,” the apostle's reasoning seems equally conclusive against all kinds and degrees of spiritual pride, and glorying in ourselves and other men, as against that which he was specially opposing.

V. 8. After the apostle had left Corinth, and the Church had got more eloquent or flattering teachers, they were satisfied and pleased: they thought themselves rich and happy, and seemed to reign as kings without him and his fellow-labourers, who had treated them as children, and kept them under, more than was agreeable to them. Many of them, it is probable, were in prosperous circumstances, and exempted from persecution; they had abundance of spiritual gifts, they grew vain of their distinctions, and they deemed themselves pre-eminent above other churches, and so used this improper language one among another. But the apostle intimated, that this was a mere delusion; he most cordially desired that they should be as happy, prosperous, honourable, and eminent, as they thought themselves; for then he knew that he should have comfort in them, and credit among them. If they had really reigned as kings, he should have reigned with them, instead of being despised by them, in addition to all his other troubles.

13 Being defamed, we entreat: [t] we are made as the filth of the world, and are the off-scouring of all things unto this day.

14 I [u] write not these things to shame you, but, as [x] my beloved sons [y] I warn you.

15 For though [z] ye have ten thousand instructors in Christ, yet have ye not many fathers: [a] for in Christ Jesus I have begotten you through the Gospel.

16 Wherefore I beseech you, [b] be ye followers of me.

17 For this cause have [c] I sent unto you Timotheus, [d] who is my beloved son, and [e] faithful in the Lord, who shall bring you into remembrance of [f] my ways which be in Christ, as I teach every where in every church.

18 Now some [g] are puffed up, as though I would not come to you.

19 But [h] I will come to you shortly, [i] if the Lord will, and will know, [k] not the speech of them which are puffed up, but the power.

20 For [l] the kingdom of God is not in word, but in power.

V. 9—13. It appeared to St. Paul, that God had chosen the apostles to be set apart, like those condemned persons in the public shows, who were brought forth last, without any defensive armour, to fight with each other, or to be exposed to wild beasts, till they were slain in the sight of the spectators, and who, if they escaped at that time, were only reserved to another day of slaughter, being appointed unto death, and having no hope of more than a short respite. Thus the apostles were distinguished by a larger share of contempt, hardship, and suffering, than any of their brethren, and were appointed to martyrdom at the end of their course, and as the only termination of their trials; that, conflicting with exceedingly urgent difficulties and distresses, in patient faith and persevering hope, and supported by omnipotent grace, they might be a spectacle to the whole intelligent creation, both men and angels, while all holy beings beheld them with solicitous affection and astonishment, and unholy beings with malice, rage, and disappointment. In this conflict Paul and his brethren were counted fools for Christ's sake, not only by unconverted Jews and Gentiles, but by the Christians at Corinth also, who seemed to be wise in Christ, through the admired instructions of their speculating teachers, the liberty to which they supposed themselves entitled, and the politic methods which they used for escaping contempt and persecution. They deemed the apostle, and such as he, weak, timid, and scrupulous Christians, men of feeble minds, narrow capacities, and inferior attainments; but they supposed themselves strong in faith, of great discernment, and superior to such fears and disquietudes as troubled others. Nay, it is probable that they deemed themselves honourable on account of their affluence, knowledge, and wisdom, and despised the apostle and his friends, as mean and obscure persons. Thus, while they lived in plenty, he and his companions in travel, (and probably the other apostles,) continued even to that day exposed to hunger and thirst; they often wanted even suitable raiment to appear in before their auditories, they were buffeted with contempt and cruelty, they wandered about without any settled habitation, and they earned their mean and scanty subsistence by the labour of their own hands. Yet, when they were reviled, they blessed and prayed for those who reproached them; they endured persecution patiently, they returned humble entreaties for defamation; but, while thus rendering good for evil, they were treated as the filth of the world, and the refuse and scum of the earth, even to that very time; they were considered as below contempt, or as worthy of execration, as pestilences and nuisances, who ought to be extirpated and purged out of society, as the common sewer carries away the filth and offscouring of the city, to prevent infection and disease. (Marg. Ref.) Some understand the words of certain human victims, peculiarly mean and vile, whom the idolaters used to offer to the infernal gods, with vehement expressions of abhorrence and execration.

V. 14—17. The apostle assured the Corinthians, that he did not thus state his distresses and their prosperity and self-sufficiency, in order to put them to shame for neglecting him, and adding to his troubles, but he affectionately warned them, as his beloved children, that their ambition, carnal security, attachment to false teachers, and lamentable divisions, would expose them to great dangers and evils. For though they had got ten thousand instructors to teach them religion, as school-masters are hired to educate other men's children, yet they would not find them endued with the disinterested, faithful, and prudent affection of a father, or entitled to the authority and honour due to a parent. This he regarded as his own character, disposition, and claim; for he had been the instrument of Christ Jesus in their conversion to the faith, by successfully preaching the Gospel to them. As they were his children, he was tenderly solicitous for their welfare; and therefore he must speak with authority as a parent, and had a right to their respectful obedience; he, however, would rather beseech them in love, to be followers of him, in preference to their new teachers, to adhere to the doctrines, regard the admonitions, obey the commands, and imitate the example, that he had given them. For this purpose, not being at that time able to come himself, he had sent Timothy to them, who was his beloved son, converted by his ministry, resembling him in spirit and conduct, and faithful in the Lord, as "a steward of his "mysteries." And Timothy, when he came, would recal to their remembrance the apostle's doctrines, and the regulations he made in every Church which he planted, that whatever had been put into disorder since he left Corinth might be rectified before he came again.

CHAP. V.

The apostle sharply reproves a scandalous incest, protected from censure in the church at Corinth, 1, 2. By the authority of Christ he orders the excommunication of the incestuous person, 3—5. He shows that the leaven of sin must be purged out, in order to keep the true passover, by faith in Christ, 6—8. Scandalous professors of Christianity must be shunned, 9—13.

V. 18—21. Some of the teachers and their adherents at Corinth were so puffed up with their imaginary importance and superiority, that they were confident the apostle would not dare to come among them, or attempt to intermeddle in their affairs. But he assured them that he fully intended to come, if the Lord would enable him, and then he would make trial, not of their oratory and tinselled eloquence, but of their power to support themselves in opposition to his apostolical authority, and the miracles which he should perform in confirmation of it. For the kingdom of God was not set up in the world, or in men's hearts, by well chosen words or eloquent harangues; but by the power of God, exerted in working miracles to prove the divine original of the Gospel, and in the efficacious operation of the Holy Spirit to convert the souls of men. The Corinthians could not but know, that the apostle's testimony had been thus confirmed among them. Would they then choose that he should come to them with the rod of correction, denouncing spiritual censures, and inflicting miraculous judgments on the refractory, as he had done on Elymas, and Peter on Ananias and Sapphira? Or would they that he should come to them in the spirit of tender love and meekness, to encourage, commend, and comfort them? This would depend on their conduct, in respect of those abuses which he was about to specify; for if they were not remedied, he must be compelled to exercise some salutary severity on the offenders.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

The ministers of Christ should be deeply sensible of the importance of their trust, as well as of the dignity of their office; that as "stewards of the mysteries of God," they may be faithful to him and to his Church; disregard their own interest, indulgence, and reputation; and willingly endure reproach and suffering, for the honour of their Lord and the salvation of souls. Thus they should apply themselves with diligence, impartiality, boldness, and simplicity, to dispense the mysteries of God, and "rightly "to divide the word of truth" among the people, according to their characters and conduct; remembering, that faithfulness is indispensably requisite in a steward; and that every other qualification must be contemptible, if this is wanting. Christians also should learn to value ministers, not so much in proportion to the brilliancy of their gifts, as by their integrity and disinterested faithfulness; and they certainly offend the Lord, who slight such as are true to their trust; or who would tempt them to be unfaithful, by flatteries, bribes, frowns, censures, or contempt. Indeed, it ought to be the smallest matter with us to be judged of men, or blamed for that which God approves, even by those whom we most love: yet it requires a superior strength of faith and grace to be totally indifferent to, and uninfluenced by, the opinion of others; and many are thus tempted to waver or warp from the constancy of their testimony. Yet men must be incompetent judges; nay, though we know more of ourselves than any others can do of us, yet our own judgment is not to be depended on, in respect of our faithfulness, any more than our own works, in respect of our justification. We should therefore rely in this, as in all other things, on the Lord; beseeching him to preserve us from deceiving ourselves, and to plead our cause against unjust censures and suspicions: and in respect of others, we should in all doubtful matters refrain from passing judgment, waiting till the Lord come: (Note, Matt. vii. 1—5.) Then every secret will be disclosed, every heart will be laid open, and all counsels manifested; every hypocrite will be unmasked, every slandered believer justified, and every faithful servant and steward applauded and rewarded. Waiting for that solemn season, and preparing to render our account, we should beware of thinking of ourselves, or of others, above what is written in God's word, and of being puffed up for one against another; lest we should despise those whom God will then honour, applaud those whose hidden things of darkness he will disclose, or trust in man instead of the Lord himself. If we duly consider what we are by nature and practice; who hath made us in any respect to differ from others; and from whom we have received all our talents; we shall see no ground of glorying in ourselves on any account, but rather of shame and humiliation before God, even if in some respects we are distinguished from our brethren, and if we do not over-rate our endowments.

V. 8—13.

Fallen man is most apt to count himself full, rich, and honourable, when he is most blind, poor, and naked; and mere professors of the Gospel, like glow-worms, shine most in the dark, as to their own opinion of themselves. The absence of faithful ministers concurs with the smooth and enticing words of false teachers, to buoy them up in vain-confidence, and to lead them to admire the wisdom of avoiding the cross, of attempting to serve God and mammon, and of deeming self-indulgence the summit of evangelical liberty. But such ministers as most desire, and would most rejoice in, their real prosperity, will be the last to congratulate them on their admission into this 'fool's paradise;' and they may know to what a precarious and carnal kingdom they are advanced, by their shyness to those pastors, who will also reign with them, if ever they are admitted into the kingdom of heaven. They whom God hath most honoured, have always been proportionably despised, hated, and abused by men; and their sufferings, even unto death, have made them an interesting spectacle to all the intelligent creation. The consideration that so many eyes are upon us, when struggling with difficulties, or conflicting with temptation, should animate us to unconquerable constancy and patience; that holy angels and saints may rejoice, and that evil spirits and wicked men may be disappointed and confounded. The wisest of men, the strongest believers, and the most honoured of God's ambassadors, have been deemed fools for Christ's sake, and treated as weak and contemptible, through bodily infirmities, poverty, want of worldly accomplishments, and an unpliant faithfulness to the souls of men; yea, this hath been their estimate among Christians, and even their own converts, who have counted themselves wise in Christ, strong, and honourable, in exact proportion as they were inferior to those whom they thus undervalued! It is very instructive to reflect on the apostles, as invested with the highest authority in the Church, endued with miraculous powers and conferring them on others, and most eminent in holiness and usefulness; yet even to the end of their lives so entirely poor and destitute, as often to want the very necessaries of life; earning their bread by manual labour, and treated every where as mean, obscure criminals! It would be useful to those, who imagine that the credit of the ministry depends, in a great measure, on their making a creditable, or even a genteel, appearance, and who emulate the affluent in the expenses of their families, to meditate carefully on the subject before us; that they might be led to conceive of a more excellent way of maintaining the dignity of character, becoming the ministers of Him "who had not where to lay his "head." If superior rank in the Church were now attended with apostolical distinctions alone, it would not so eagerly be pursued. We should, however, not be much cast down, if in some small degree we are conformed to the apostles, as to these things; and if we too should be deemed fools for Christ's sake, weak and despicable, even by professors of the Gospel. Though unable to appear like our wealthy hearers, we do not generally want wholesome food, decent raiment, or comfortable habitations; and if sometimes a faithful minister be thus destitute, it is commonly the reproach of the people, rather than any disparagement to him. We should persist in blessing, entreating, and being kind to, our calumniators and persecutors; and if we should be unable "to overcome evil "with good," but still be treated as the "filth of the "world, and the off-scouring of all things;" we may recollect that far better men than we are, have been thus vilified.

V. 14—21.

It is peculiarly distressing, when a faithful minister sees his spiritual children turn away from him with disdain and aversion: but let such a one remember that St. Paul continually experienced the same trial, that he may not be bowed down with discouragement. No man indeed must be followed further than he follows Christ: yet believers should remember that a peculiar regard is due to those whom God hath honoured as the instruments of their regeneration; that it is very criminal to despise or grieve such faithful friends, as feel a real parental affection for them; and that those instructors are commonly influenced by selfish or party-motives, who want to draw them off, on frivolous pretences, from their affectionate care and faithful ministry. We ought, however, to persevere in attempting to do good to those who are thus turned from us or against us: and it may be useful to put them in remembrance of those things, which they have formerly learned, but seem to have forgotten. We should imitate the tenderness of wise and good parents, who are not easily induced to forego all care, even of their disobedient children; but who know how to employ rebukes and corrections, as well as the language of love and the spirit of meekness. The kingdom of God is not set up, or supported, by florid metaphors or well-turned periods, but by a divine power; and they are the most eminent ministers, not who speak most gracefully, but by whom God works most powerfully. Spiritual censures and Scriptural warnings are greatly to be feared, though not followed at present by sensible temporal judgments; and they who are so self-confident as to despise them, are most likely to experience their dreadful effects.

NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 1—5. After the preceding introductory observations, the apostle next proceeded to animadvert on the most flagrant abuse, which was connived at by the Corinthians. A Christian was guilty of incest with his mother-in-law, probably while his father was yet living! (2 Cor. vii. 12.) This was a crime, which even the licentious Gentiles never named without the most indignant detestation: yet it was well known and commonly reported, that this member of the Christian Church was guilty of it; and he seems to have habitually lived with his mother-in-law as his wife. But though so scandalous a wickedness was committed, and escaped censure among them, yet they were puffed up with a vain conceit of their gifts and superior attainments, and were not ashamed of it, or concerned about it. Probably the guilty person was of considerable rank among them, and a zealous adherent of some of their popular teachers, so that a party-spirit, and a false notion of Christian liberty, secured him from censure. But, if they had been properly disposed, they would have mourned over such an enormity, and humbled themselves before God, with earnest prayers, entreating him to remove all obstacles, that he, who had done this nefarious deed, might be separated from their company. For though the apostle was absent, and could not therefore exert himself as he would otherwise have done, and though he was aware that his peremptory interference would give great offence, yet, "being present in "spirit," having the whole affair clearly before his mind, (perhaps by a supernatural operation of the Holy Spirit,) and being full of concern for the honour of Christ, and the welfare of the Church, he had already determined in the case, and had passed sentence on the criminal, as if he had been upon the spot. He therefore charged them in the name, by the authority, and for the honour of Christ, that, when they met together as a Church, they would consider him as present in spirit among them, to ratify their sentence with his apostolical authority, and to enforce it by the power of Christ, and thus to expel the incestuous person from their communion, that he might not be considered as a Christian, but as a heathen, a subject of Satan's kingdom. Yet this was not to be done in hatred, or for his ruin, but in hopes that it would be the means of bringing him to repentance, and the mortification of his fleshly lusts, that so his soul might be saved in the day of Christ. Probably the apostle expected that this solemn sentence of excommunication would be attended by some miraculous infliction of pain and disease, to the wasting, or even the death of his body; yet by "delivering him over "to Satan," he seems to intend his expulsion from the visible kingdom of Christ into that of the devil, and not that Satan would inflict the correction which might follow. No doubt evil spirits are able and willing to disorder the body, or distract the mind, or destroy life, if God permit; yet it seems more reasonable to think that God by miracle inflicted the disease, than that he permitted Satan to do it. It should, however, be noted, that, when supernatural visitations do not accompany ecclesiastical censures, temporal pains and penalties ought not to be annexed to them.—Abuses of this kind have made way for the disuse or relaxation of salutary discipline throughout a great part of the Christian Church. 'A mother-in-law marries her son-in-'law, with no favourable auspices, by no authority! Oh! 'incredible wickedness! and unheard of through life, ex-'cept in this one instance.' (Cicero.)

V. 6—8. It was evident that the Corinthians had no good cause to glory in their eminence and prosperity, for their connivance at the gross wickedness before mentioned was alone sufficient to prove that pure religion was greatly declined among them. What! did they not know that a little leaven would soon ferment and sour the whole lump of dough? And that corrupt principles and examples, if connived at, would diffuse their baleful efficacy through the whole Church? The judgment of men would thus be corrupted, their conduct would be lax and licentious, and they would altogether become a scandalous community. As the Jews therefore used to search with candles in every corner of their houses, that they might cast out all the leaven before they made the unleavened bread for the passover, so ought they to purge out such crimes and offenders. These evils, however congenial with their old state of idolatry, were utterly inconsistent with the purity of a Christian Church, which should be a new lump, as they were to resemble the unleavened bread used at the passover. The Jews, indeed, had only the type and shadow of good things to come, in their appointed feast; but Christ himself, the true Passover, had been sacrificed for his Church, to atone for their sins, and to be the spiritual sustenance of their souls. It behooved them therefore to keep the sacred feast, not with the old leaven of heathen licentiousness, nor yet with the leaven of malice, ambition, and contention, but with that simplicity and sincerity of repentance and holy obedience, which were the truth and substance shadowed forth by the unleavened bread. This might either be applied to the habitual feast of communion with God, by faith in Christ, or to their commemorating his death in the Lord's supper; and it included both personal purity, and the purity of the religious society. (Notes, &c. Ex. xii.) Some expositors confidently maintain that the incestuous person was one of the teachers who opposed the apostle, or the opposing teacher, supposing that the apostle had a single false teacher in his mind. But this is not probable; and in the second epistle, where he directs the Corinthians to comfort the incestuous person, as brought to deep repentance, and in danger of being "swallowed up of over much sorrow," he yet speaks of "false apostles, ministers of Satan, trans-"formed into the ministers of righteousness," which indeed wholly subverts this supposition. Lewdness 'is 'the old leaven to be purged out, because the Corinthians 'were infamous for it to a proverb.' (Whitby.)

V. 9—13. Probably the apostle had in some previous epistle, (which has not been preserved,) warned the Corinthians not to associate with fornicators, or persons who were known to live in any kind of lewdness. Some expositors indeed are of opinion, that the apostle did not refer to any epistle which he had before written, but to what he had enforced in the preceding verses of this chapter. But this certainly is not the most obvious meaning of the passage. And why should we suppose, that all his letters, (any more than all his sermons,) must be preserved as a part of the sacred volume? Can it be thought probable, on reflection, that this zealous apostle, so admirably qualified to give epistolary instruction, who lay so long in prison, and was, in various ways, so long kept at a distance from his friends and children, should, in the course of his whole ministry, write no more letters than are now extant? However this may be, he did not mean to prohibit all intercourse with fornicators, or with covetous men, or with such as oppressed the poor by iniquitous exactions; or even with idolaters, provided they were not professed Christians; for so general were these crimes, that such a prohibition would have been equivalent to a command to leave their families and occupations, and to become hermits and recluses, which would by no means be for their good, or for the honour of God. He would therefore now more explicitly say, that if one called a brother, a member of the Christian Church, was guilty of fornication, or similar crimes, or of reviling, or intemperance, he ought not only to be excommunicated, but his society should be shunned, as infectious, by every believer, and they all ought even to refuse to eat with him, till he had given evidence of his sincere repentance. Thus the infection might be stopped, and the scandal prevented, and the most effectual method would be taken to convince offenders of their guilt and danger. But the apostle did not deem himself required, or authorized, to determine any thing concerning those that were not professed Christians, (which might be the reason why no mention is made of censuring the woman who had been guilty in this matter, she probably being a heathen,) but did it not belong to them to exercise a judicial authority over the members of their own Church, and to censure the scandalous? (iv. 5.) As for those without, they must be left to the judgment of God, who would not permit them to escape unpunished. Therefore, let the Corinthians proceed to do their duty, by putting away from among them this notorious offender, without regarding the displeasure that might be excited by it; otherwise the apostle would be compelled to come unto them with a rod, and to exert his miraculous powers in inflicting punishments on them.—Dr. Hammond, and some others, by far-fetched criticisms, interpret almost all the words here used of some kind or degree of lewdness. Thus the covetous the extortioners, and even the railers, are supposed to mean debauched or licentious characters, as if covetousness, extortion, and reviling, were not totally inconsistent with Christianity, or as if such a writer as St. Paul would have needlessly accumulated words, in speaking of one species of wickedness, and not have dropped a hint concerning other kinds of wickedness, which are equally abominable in the sight of God!

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

How grievous is it, that those crimes should sometimes be notoriously committed by professors of the Gospel, which heathens would be ashamed of! Wo be to the world because of such offences! And wo be to them by whom such offences come! yea, to those by whom they are connived at! Spiritual pride, ambition, and false doctrines and teachers, directly tend to introduce and perpetuate these scandals; for men's gifts, influence, notions, and connexions, are in such circumstances more regarded than their conduct. So that religious societies, as well as individuals, are generally most puffed up, when they have most need to be ashamed, and to mourn; and sometimes those men are gloried in, especially when eminent in gifts or affluence, who must be taken away, as mortified limbs, before the Church can thrive in vital godliness. When a man has wisdom, zeal, and love, he can have but one judgment in cases of this kind; and if he possesses authority or influence, he will use it, whether present or absent, in exciting those, who are more immediately concerned, to prefer the honour of the Gospel to every personal or party-interest, to venture all consequences in bearing testimony against such scandals, and to separate from among them those who have done such deeds. It would be desirable that all the ministers and Churches of Christ were enabled to exercise this salutary discipline, in the name and by the authority of their Lord, and to deliver over into the visible kingdom of Satan, all who evidently disgrace their profession, and that those who have such discipline among them, did always exercise it with exact impartiality, due solemnity, and tender compassion to the souls of offenders. But, alas! it hath been so generally abused by men's carnal passions, or rendered inefficient by family-connexions, secular and party-influence, and an undue regard to the rich above the poor, that a more complete revival of pure and spiritual religion seems necessary, before it can produce its full effect. Far more, however, might be done in most places than now is, if fear of man, respect of persons, and carnal policy, did not sometimes deter those concerned from decidedly acting according to their judgment. But, alas! many even glory in their prosperous state, when abuses prevail, which fully authorize us to say, "your glorying is not good." Few seem sufficiently aware, that "a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump;" and that the honour and success of the Gospel, and the flourishing of the Church, require that the old leaven be diligently sought out and purged away, though the numbers and wealth of the society should be greatly diminished by it; and that none should be deemed a part of the true Church, who does not appear to have renounced and mortified his old sins, that thus the whole company may be a new and unleavened mass. So far is the sacrifice of "Christ our Passover for us" from rendering this personal and public sanctification unnecessary, that it furnishes the most cogent reasons and effectual motives for it; else we can neither live by faith in him, nor join in his ordinances, with comfort and profit. This feast cannot be solemnized, these provisions cannot be relished, along with the old leaven of sensual indulgence, or that of malice and wickedness, but must be attended with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth.

V. 9—13.

When individuals, who mourn over those that have done evil, cannot prevail to have them put away from among them, they should refuse to associate with them, and protest against their scandals by withdrawing from them: and though we should not be severe on the infirmities, or even the occasional falls, of such as are humbled for them, yet when any one, who professes the Gospel, is a fornicator, or covetous, or a railer, or a drunkard, or an extortioner, charity itself requires of us to avoid all fellowship with him, even more than we do with persons guilty of similar crimes, who make no profession of religion; lest we should appear to allow of his sins, because he is of our party and sentiments. But how grievous is it, that we must needs still go out of the world, (though called Christian,) if we should resolutely refuse all intercourse with such characters as are here described! So prevalent is vice on every side! We must, however, leave those that are without, and who are strangers or enemies to the doctrines of grace, to the judgment of God. We should first judge ourselves, and take heed to give no offence to others: then we should shun such professors of the Gospel, as would be an offence to us, and a reproach to the cause; and thus attending to our own duty in this respect, we should wait and pray for times of greater purity in the Church of God.

NOTES.

CHAP. VI. V. 1—6. The apostle here reproved another lamentable evil in the Corinthian Church. He abruptly inquired, as one astonished, whether any of them could venture to go to law with their brethren before the heathen magistrates, who were unrighteous persons, and might be expected to be unjust judges in such matters. Whereas they ought to have decided all their differences, (if such there were,) by the arbitration of the saints, the holy disciples of Christ. What! with all their superior knowledge, did they not understand that believers, being first declared righteous and heirs of God, at the day of judgment will be assessors with Christ in judging the world, and will concur in the sentence denounced by him against the wicked? And if this honour was intended them, were they not worthy to be intrusted with the decision of such causes, as related only to the comparatively trifling concerns of this life? Whereas, even fallen angels, whose slaves they once were, and by whom they were long harassed, will be judged by them; and the punishment of those proud and malignant spirits will be embittered by this mortifying circumstance. If, then, they had causes relative to secular matters to determine, they need not take off the ministers of the Gospel from their work, nor select such as were qualified for other services: even those of inferior abilities and estimation in the Church

7 Now therefore [n] there is utterly a fault among you, because ye go to law one with another: [o] Why do ye not rather take wrong? why do ye not rather suffer yourselves to be defrauded?

8 Nay, [p] ye do wrong, and defraud, and that your brethren.

9 [q] Know ye not that the [r] unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God? be not deceived: neither [s] fornicators, nor idolaters, nor [t] adulterers, nor effeminate, nor [u] abusers of themselves with mankind,

10 Nor [x] thieves, nor [y] covetous, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor extortioners, shall inherit the kingdom of God.

11 And [z] such were some of you: [a] but ye are washed, [b] but ye are sanctified, [c] but ye are justified, in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God.

were competent for this business. At present they acted in such a manner as was very shameful; for after having greatly gloried in their wisdom and gifts, there seemed to be not so much as one wise man among them, not one, that could be trusted as an arbitrator between his brethren! So that such disputes were carried before the unbelievers, who would thence naturally conclude the Christians to be a selfish and litigious set of men. Doubtless, therefore, there was a great fault among them, which could not be palliated: their quarrels proved them carnal and selfish: this effect of them was exceedingly dishonourable to the Gospel; and their connivance at these scandals proved, that the Church was far from being in a flourishing state. The Jews were allowed to settle matters of property among themselves, according to their own law; and Christians would doubtless be admitted to exercise the same kind of authority; yet voluntary reference to arbitration seems rather to be intended. 'The apostle is not treating con'cerning the cause to be judged between believers and 'unbelievers, nor of the public administration of justice; 'but of those differences, which nothing hindered from 'being settled by private arbitration. If the Corinthians 'had been such as they ought to have been; this question 'would have been superfluous: for no one would have given 'his brother any occasion for litigation. To decide such 'matters as these, they ought by no means to employ the 'pastors, or teachers, or other rulers, of the Church, or 'the deacons; who were fully occupied in their sacred 'functions: but rather they should choose some of those '(afterwards called the laity,) who being less taken up in 'sacred services, might be more at leisure to attend to 'these secular concerns.' (Beza.) The word rendered least esteemed, is elsewhere translated, despised, or set at nought. (i. 28. xvi. 11. Luke xviii. 9. xxiii. 11. Acts iv. 11. Rom. xiv. 3. 10. 2 Cor. x. 10. Gal. iv. 14. 1 Thes. v. 20.) 'It is full of sense, signifying to esteem a man 'to have no worth in him, to disdain, vilify, and nullify 'a man; to set at nought, and basely to esteem a 'thing.' (Leigh.) 'If you still retain your secular 'judicatures, you set them to be judges over you, who 'are despised in the Church.' (Whitby.) This learned writer reads the clause interrogatively: "Do ye set them "to judge, who are despised in the Church?" But did the Church avowedly despise and set at nought those very magistrates, whom the apostles commanded them to honour and obey? Mr. Locke understands it of private persons not appointed to the magistracy: but it does not appear that the original word was ever used in that sense. In fact, none of the interpretations above given are fully satisfactory: for the meanest Christian could not be despised and set at nought in the Church, except as that Church was corrupted. But may not the apostle refer to the vain glory and self-wisdom of the leading persons at Corinth, who would, by necessary consequence, despise such as were inferior to them in knowledge, utterance, and spiritual gifts, in proportion as they exalted themselves? Yet the meanest real and experienced Christians, whom they set at nought, were competent to decide such causes as they brought before the heathen magistrates; perhaps more competent than their despisers.

V. 7, 8. 'There is a fault among you, that you go 'to law at all; it being either, on the one side, want of 'patience and Christian contentment, that you do not 'rather bear some injuries, than thus seek to redress 'them; or, on the other, covetousness and injustice, which 'move you to do wrong to, and defraud, your brethren.' (Whitby.) No doubt there were faults on both sides, though the dishonest party was most criminal. Fault. (ἥττημα.) 'That is, a want of fortitude of mind, which 'causes you to be "overcome with evil,"—whence dis'putes and litigations arise.' (Beza.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9—11. The apostle here plainly declared his doubts concerning some of the professed Christians at Corinth, as their conduct was so contrary to the precepts of God's word. What, did they not know that unjust or dishonest persons shall not inherit the kingdom of God? There is vast energy in these inquiries, when we consider that they were addressed to a people, who were puffed up with an imagination of their superiority to others in wisdom and knowledge. If, however, they did not pay a proper regard to so plain and evident a truth, he must warn them not to deceive themselves, or each other, and to take heed that Satan did not deceive them: for they would certainly find, that persons who lived in the practice of any of the vices and iniquities which he proceeded to enumerate, would be excluded from heaven at last, whatever their profession, gifts, or creed, had been. The word effeminate does not seem merely to denote persons of a soft and self-indulgent temper and conduct in other matters, but such as violated the order of nature by abominable practices, only to be named with those of "the abusers of them"selves with mankind." He did not, however, mean, that they, who had been guilty of these or similar abominations, were excluded from salvation; for even some of the true Christians at Corinth had been habitually criminal in many of these respects; and probably most of them in one or other of them. But, then, they had been washed, not only by the water of baptism, but in "the Fountain "opened for sin and uncleanness;" so that they were sanctified from the love and practice of sin, and to the love and service of God, by the operation of the Holy Spirit, as well as pardoned and justified by faith in the name of the Lord Jesus. Thus their character and conduct were changed, as well as their state: but if any one of them still practised these vices, he deceived himself, if he supposed himself to be an accepted believer. The arrangement of the expressions in the eleventh verse shows, that no argument can be drawn merely from that circumstance, in respect of controverted points of doctrine. 'Here is the figure called Hyperbaton: for we "are "justified in the name of the Lord Jesus," 'and "sanc"tified by the Spirit of our God." (So Philem. 5.) 'To be justified, still signifies, (in all Paul's epistles,) to 'be absolved from the guilt of sin, and approved as righ'teous, either at present, or before God's tribunal. And 'so "the name of Christ," 'when we are said to be 'justified by it, must signify faith in Christ dying for 'us; "for in him shall all that believe be justified." (Whitby.) 'The apostle begins with those vices, with 'which a rich and luxurious city abounded, seriously 'warning them, that repentance and forgiveness, justifica'tion and sanctification, are joined by an indissoluble bond.' (Beza.)

V. 12—17. It is surprising that expositors should speak of the Judaizing teachers as the authors of the divisions at Corinth, when their philosophizing disposition, and their abuses of Christian liberty, plainly show them to have been speculating Gentile converts, who ran into the opposite extreme, and introduced a specious system of antinomianism. As all meats might lawfully be eaten, the ceremonial law being no longer in force, they were disposed to extend the same principle even to fornication, as if that too were only prohibited by the ceremonial law, or as if the moral law also had lost its force! This false principle, added to their heathen maxims and habits, seems to have made way for their connivance at the conduct of the incestuous person. Now, says the apostle, admitting the truth of this position, that "all things are lawful to "a Christian," which might be granted in respect of meats, yet all things are not expedient to him, or consistent with his real benefit, and that of his brethren or neighbours: so that even this liberty must be used under certain limitations. (Notes, Rom. xiv. 13—23.) Moreover, a Christian should habituate all his natural inclinations to subjection; and not allow them, by unrestricted indulgence, even in lawful things, to obtain a power over him, so that he cannot refrain when it is requisite that he should. Indeed, all kinds of food were created for the support of the body, and for no other purpose; and the stomach and bowels were formed to receive, digest, and convert them into nourishment: yet both the meat and the body, (in respect of its present subsistence,) will soon be destroyed, according to the appointment of God. But he did not form the body, to be employed in fornication and promiscuous intercourse of the sexes, which counteract, and, if universal, would entirely defeat, the design of the Creator, in making them male and female; namely, the increase of the human species, and the proper training of children, and all the comforts and advantages of relative and domestic life, as springing from honourable marriage. But even this was a very subordinate end, for which their bodies were created: for they were "for the Lord," to be employed in his service; especially the bodies of believers were "for the Lord Jesus," to be presented as living sacrifices to him, and employed as instruments of righteousness to his glory, (Notes, Rom. vi. 12. 13—16. xii. 1;) and the Lord Jesus was appointed to be the Saviour, Proprietor, and happiness, of the body as well as of the soul: for God had raised him up from the grave, as the earnest of the resurrection of all his people, by his power, to glory and immortality. And did they not know that their bodies were members of Christ's mystical body, the Church? Was it then meet that the body of a believer, which stood in so high and honourable a relation to the Lord of glory, the incarnate Son of God, should be disgraced and abused by a vile intercourse with a harlot? They ought to know, that this was to become one body, or flesh, with a licentious woman, by a most degrading and pernicious deviation from the original institution of marriage. Whereas he that was united to the Lord was one spirit with him; this union was formed by the communication of the Holy Spirit, and was of a spiritual and sacred nature, comprising a conformity of judgment and disposition, and a sympathy of soul: and could a Christian think of being one spirit with Christ, and one flesh with an harlot?

18 [r] Flee fornication. Every sin that a man doeth is without the body; but he that committeth fornication [s] sinneth against his own body.

19 [t] What! know ye not that [u] your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost which is in you, which ye have of God, [x] and ye are not your own?

V. 18—20. As this vice was so inconsistent with Christian holiness, and as the temptation of the Corinthians to it, from former bad habits, the example of their neighbours, and abundant opportunities, would be many, they ought to flee from it, as from an enemy whom they dared not face: they should shun all incentives to it, and reject every thought of it or solicitation to it, without parleying with them. For it might further be observed, that other sins in general have their chief effect upon the mind rather than on the body, and commonly injure others more immediately than the man himself: but lewd persons not only sin against God, their neighbours, and their own souls, but against their own bodies also; dishonouring and abusing them to the vilest purposes, and bringing upon them the most painful, loathsome, and destructive diseases. Thus they, as it were, take their bodies, and, by an act of cruelty to themselves, and gradual suicide, present them for sacrifice to the filthiest demons. This is in some degree the case in other kinds of sensual excess; but far more in respect of this vice than any other: as every one must know, who is acquainted with the horrible effects of lewdness in populous cities, and with the vast multitudes that are annually cut off, in early life, and in the most deplorable manner, by the various diseases, with which it hath pleased God to show his abhorrence of it. Moreover, Christians ought to know that their bodies were consecrated to be the temples of the Holy Ghost, who dwelt in them, as the gift of the Father through the Son, to consecrate them to God, and prepare them for his glory; so that in this respect too they were no longer their own, but the property of God the Spirit, who had taken possession of them as his holy habitation. For they had been redeemed from merited condemnation and hopeless slavery, by the atoning sacrifice of Christ, who, having thus bought them with a price, had acquired for himself, and for the Father and the Spirit, as One with him, a new and endearing right to them and their services, in addition to that which he had as their Creator. So that, being wholly and on every account the Lord's, they were bound to devote both body and soul to his glory, in every service to which he called them, and to make no other use of either body or soul, than was consistent with that holy and entire devotedness to God. The language of this chapter is remarkable: "God the Father will raise the bodies of "believers by his own power," (14. John v. 25—28.) Their bodies are members of Christ, and for him, (as he for them,) his property, to be devoted to him, having been bought with the price of his blood. And they are also the temples of the Holy Ghost, and thus his property, so that they are not their own, but God's, to glorify him. Does not all this demonstrate, that St. Paul considered the God, to whom Christians especially belonged, as subsisting in three divine persons, The Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, to each of whom he shows their peculiar relation? This accords with the form of baptism and benediction. 'The question, "Know ye not this?" 'is repeated six times in this one chapter; which may seem 'to carry with it a just reproach to the Corinthians, who 'had got a new and better instructor than himself, in 'whom they so much gloried.' (Locke.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

The high privileges and glorious prospects of believers should suggest arguments to them against sin, and for the practice of every duty; that so a just sense of the dignity gratuitously bestowed on them may render them superior to the debasing allurements of vice, and the love of worldly vanities. Surely, the saints of God, and the assessors of Christ in judgment on men and angels, should not so eagerly contend with each other about secular interests, as to make their appeal to the enemies of religion! Surely, they are competent to decide such comparatively insignificant causes among themselves! If there were not utterly a fault among them, such disputes would rarely occur: and if at any time they became unavoidable, it would be easy to decide them by arbitration, were not professors of the Gospel too tenacious of their supposed right, and too much on their own side: for real Christians, even of moderate abilities, might generally determine such matters with sufficient equity, if they were impartially set before them, and unreservedly left to them. It must, however, be a shame to any religious company, if there is no man among them so wise and faithful, that his brethren dare trust him to determine their secular differences. Indeed, law-suits with those that are without, need seldom be had recourse to, if Christians were disinterested and forbearing in due measure; if they would, in all tolerable matters, suffer themselves to be defrauded and injured, for the sake of peace, and the credit of the Gospel. But brother would never go to law with brother before unbelievers, if there were not a very great fault on one side, or both: and much deliberation, counsel, prayer, and endeavour for accommodation, should surely precede, before a man dare to enter upon so perilous and disgraceful a business. But, alas, many professors of the Gospel not only refuse to bear and forgive injuries; but they do wrong and defraud, and that their brethren! Whether such men act contrary to their consciences, or are misled by false principles, they should be reminded, that "the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God:" for no one, continuing an adulterer, a fornicator, or lascivious, a dishonest, covetous, fraudulent, drunken, or malicious man, can have either title to, or meetness for, the holy habitation of God and his saints. Many deceive themselves and others in these matters; but the thing is impracticable, and the hope of it the grossest presumption. As many, however, who are now true

V. 12—20.

Satan takes advantage of men's ignorance, pride, and lusts, to drive them from one extreme to another. Thus, when they are led to renounce superstitious scruples, they run into inexpedient, or even unlawful, indulgences. But the wisdom from above teaches a man to guard against such mistakes; to abstain from lawful things, when inexpedient; and to exert an authority over his own inclinations; that he may not be brought under the power of any of them. This is a difficult lesson, but of vast importance: and if we consider how soon all animal pleasures, and our present life, shall terminate, the reflection may teach us moderation in the most innocent gratifications, and arm us against temptations to such as are unlawful. Our bodies should be considered as "for the Lord," and be devoted to his service, that they may at length share his resurrection, and be made like to his glorious body. How degrading, then, how ungrateful, how sacrilegious, to make the members of Christ the members of an harlot! Or to defile the temple of the Holy Ghost, and to alienate the Lord's peculiar property to the vile purposes of fornication! It is, however, needful to fortify our minds on every side against these dangerous temptations, by which so many eminent men have been cast down, and shamefully overcome: and in this view even the horrid diseases incident to those, who thus sin against their own bodies, may be profitably reflected upon, especially by the young and inexperienced, in order to caution them to flee from so destructive a vice, and to keep at the utmost distance from all its fascinating allurements. But nobler motives should animate the believer's soul: being united to Christ as one spirit, and bought with a price of inestimable value, he should consider himself as wholly the Lord's, by the most endearing and indissoluble ties; that, seeking all his happiness in his favour, he may live wholly devoted to him, and may "glo-"rify him in body and spirit, which are his." (Notes, Prov. ii. 16—20. v. vi. 24—35. vii. 6—27.)

NOTES.

CHAP. VII. V. 1—5. It seems, that they, who retained their regard to the apostle's authority at Corinth, had written to him, desiring his decision of several questions which had been started among them: and he here proceeded to answer their inquiries, especially respecting marriage. While some of them pleaded for the lawfulness of fornication, others seem to have imbibed the sentiments of the Pythagoreans, and to have deemed marriage itself inconsistent with Christian purity, or at least inimical to intellectual improvement. On the other hand, the Pharisees generally taught, that it was sinful for a man to live unmarried beyond his twentieth year; but at the same time they laid down many superstitious rules concerning the conduct of married persons. In determining, therefore, this matter, the apostle first allowed, that, in many cases and circumstances, it might be profitable to a man to live unmarried, and might render him more useful to others, provided he were able and willing to live with that entire chastity, which the single life required. Nevertheless, "because of fornications," on account of those propensities which God originally, for wise reasons, implanted in human nature, and which man's sinfulness has rendered generally too predominant to be kept in absolute subjection; in order to prevent fornication and other lewd practices, and to remove the temptations to them; "let "every man have his own wife, and every woman her "own husband." In all cases this was allowable; in very many it was far best that it should be so. Nor ought they to imagine it a virtue in them to live apart; or that it was even allowable for one of them to withdraw, without the consent, or contrary to the inclinations, of the other: but in every respect, they should consider mutual compliance and affection an incumbent duty; and the proper means of living in harmony and purity, and at a distance

8 I say therefore [m] to the unmarried and widows, it is good for them if they abide even as I.

11 But and if she depart, let her remain unmarried, [q] or be reconciled to her husband: [r] and let not the husband put away his wife.

12 But to the rest [s] speak I, not the Lord; [t] If any brother hath a wife that believeth not, and she be pleased to dwell with him, let him not put her away.

13 And the woman which hath an husband that believeth not, and if he be pleased to dwell with her, let her not leave him.

from temptation; remembering that they had an unalienable property in each other's person, in respect of all the purposes for which marriage was appointed. This places the husband and the wife entirely on the same ground, and as much forbids him to take another woman, as it does her to cohabit with another man; so that it is absolutely decisive against polygamy. Nor ought married persons to deprive each other of that preservative against temptation which is their due; so that they ought not to separate, but by consent, for the spiritual work of fasting and prayer on extraordinary occasions: and even this should not generally be for any long time; lest Satan should take advantage of their weakness, to harass and defile their minds by improper thoughts, or even to tempt them to unlawful indulgences.

V. 6—9. These things the apostle spoke to them as what were allowable, not as giving an absolute commandment. Men might use their own discretion about marrying; and married persons concerning their conduct in that state; provided they did not needlessly cross each other's inclinations, do injustice to one another, or throw any temptation in the way. For the apostle would have wished, that all his Christian brethren had been as free from disquietude in that respect as he was; that if the glory of God, and the circumstances in which they were placed required it, they might live unmarried with as much content as he did. Some think that he was a widower, but this is uncertain. We cannot suppose that he wished marriage to cease among Christians; but only that every one might be enabled calmly to use his prudence in that respect, without being necessitated to marry, when otherwise it would not have been adviseable. But the apostle knew, that his experience in this matter was not a rule for other men; as this superiority to the animal inclinations was a special gift of God, which he gave to one and not to another, as he saw good, and that in different proportions. (Notes, Matt. xix. 9—12.) He would therefore remind unmarried persons, and such as had been left in widowhood, that their condition had many advantages, which rendered it good for them to abide in it: but if any of them found that they could not obtain the gift of entire continence, it was allowable, and even incumbent on them, to marry; as it would be far better for them, more holy in itself, and more becoming their profession, to marry, than to be harassed with polluting temptations, and continually in danger of being drawn into forbidden gratifications. 'This whole passage is framed against those, who 'condemn second marriages, when the first has been dis'solved by death.' (Beza.)

V. 10—14. As to married persons, the apostle did not counsel, but command them; and not by his own authority, but by that of Christ, and according to his precepts, that they should not separate from each other; which was common among the Gentiles as well as the Jews, and that on very frivolous pretences. The wife must not leave her husband; or if she had been parted from him, she must not think of marrying again; rather, she ought to make every advance and concession, to bring about a reconciliation with him; and the same rules were to be observed by the husband. Doubtless the exception is implied, which our Lord made in the directions given by him in this particular. And though Jesus had not given express rules in the following cases, yet the apostle deemed himself authorized to enjoin, that the Christian who was married to an unbeliever, whether a heathen or a Jew, who chose to live with him, notwithstanding this difference of religion, should not put her away; as the Jews, for reasons peculiar to their situation, were required to do by their idolatrous wives. (Notes, Ezra x.) Christians, indeed, ought not to marry unbelievers: yet if that relation had been entered into, either before conversion, or through inattention to this rule, it would cause great confusion and scandal to dissolve it on that account. The same held good in respect of a Christian woman, who had an unbelieving husband, that chose to live with her. Nor ought any person to suppose that this union, as one flesh with unbelievers or idolaters in lawful marriage, was inconsistent with being one spirit with the Lord, as fornication had been declared to be, (vi. 15—17:) for the unbelieving husband or wife was sanctified to the believer, by the appointment and command of God; so that their marriage was holy and honourable. If this had not been so appointed, but Christians had been commanded to put away their unbelieving partners, as the Jews did their idolatrous wives, the children of such marriages would have been accounted relatively unclean, and so excluded from baptism, as those of the Jews in the above-mentioned case were from circumcision: but, on the contrary, they were accounted holy in the Christian churches, and thus admitted among them, as a part "of the visible "kingdom of God." This exposition of the Scripture before us has indeed been much controverted; and some have explained holy, or unclean, to mean legitimate, or illegitimate: but in all the places, where these words are found in Scripture, there is not one that will fairly admit of this sense. No doubt, the children of heathens, who were lawfully married, were as legitimate as those of Christians, yet they are never said to be holy. Something more must be meant by the believer sanctifying the unbelieving party, than merely legalizing their marriage; for that would have been the case, if both had been unbelievers; and the children would not really be more holy in respect of their nature, if one parent was a believer, than if both were unbelievers. But as the word unclean is frequently used in a relative sense, denoting unfit to be admitted to God's ordinances, and holy the contrary; as in this sense the male children of the Jews were holy, and so partakers of circumcision; while those of the Gentiles, and even such as had one idolatrous parent, were unclean, and excluded from circumcision: so I cannot but conclude, after long attention to the subject, that the baptism of the infant-offspring of Christians is here referred to, as at that time customary in the churches; and that the Corinthians knew that this was not objected to, when only one parent was a Christian. 'Hence then the argu-'ment for infant-baptism runs thus: If the holy seed 'among the Jews was therefore to be circumcised, and to 'be made federally holy by receiving the sign of the cove-'nant, and being admitted into the number of God's holy 'people, because they were born in sanctity, or were 'seminally holy; for "the root being holy, so are the "branches also:" 'then, by like reason, the holy seed of 'Christians ought to be admitted to baptism, and receive 'the sign of the Christian covenant, "the laver of rege-"neration;" 'and so be entered into the society of the 'Christian church. (Whitby.)

V. 15, 16. The apostle further observed, that if the unconverted wife or husband chose to depart, and to disannul the marriage, according to the laws of the community, the believer was not required to act in opposition to it, or as if in bondage by the preceding contract. Yet separations ought to be avoided, if this could be done: for God had called them to live in peace with all men, as far as possible; and therefore they ought so to act, that if a separation took place, no part of the blame should attach to the Christian. Such an union, indeed, would occasion much grief and trouble with an unbeliever; yet that ought patiently to be endured: for how did the believing wife and husband know, but that God would make use of them for the conversion and salvation of their unbelieving companions, by their pious, affectionate, and exemplary behaviour, edifying converse, and fervent prayers? The fathers in general interpret this, as allowing the deserted person to marry again. 'Such a total and perpetual 'desertion must, (on this interpretation,) dissolve the 'matrimony, and render the deserting person as dead to 'the other. A brother or a sister is not enslaved, after 'all means of peace and reconciliation have been in vain 'attempted, and the unbeliever hath entered into another 'marriage or rather hath dissolved the former by adul-'tery; as may well be supposed of those heathens, who 'thus separated from their Christian mates. And this 'interpretation seems to be confirmed, from the former 'words relating to the case of the believing wives and 'husbands; "if they depart, let them remain unmar-"ried;" 'it being not to be supposed that believers would 'dissolve the bond of matrimony by adultery. Therefore 'the apostle seems to grant this in the case of unbelievers 'departing from Christians on the account of their faith." (Whitby.) Total and perpetual desertion, when accompanied by evident adultery in the deserting party, undoubtedly sets the other party at full liberty, according to the scriptural rule; for deserting a husband or wife, to live with another man or woman, or in any way evidently adulterous, must as much dissolve the marriage, as a divorce explicitly given on account of adultery. V. 17—24. The preceding subject led the apostle to digress to a more general topic. In ordinary cases, and without good reasons to the contrary, it was proper that every man should continue to serve God, by the improvement of those gifts that he had distributed to him, and in that situation in which he had called him. This was the general rule, which the apostle gave in all the churches. Thus, if a Jew, or circumcised proselyte, had been converted; let him not deny, conceal, or be disquieted about his circumcision; or refuse that regard to the ceremonial law, which might tend to conciliate his unbelieving brethren: but let not the uncircumcised convert submit to that abrogated ordinance, or at all take that yoke upon him. For in fact the difference was in itself immaterial, unless they put such matters in a wrong place: but obedience to the commandments of God was the great concern. While the Mosaic dispensation continued in force, it was proper that its requirements should be complied with; and it might be still expedient for the Jewish converts to pay some regard to them: but the Gentiles had nothing to do with them, and need only regard the precepts of the moral law, and the institutions of Christ, from a principle of faith in him, and love to him. It is obvious, that the apostle is not here speaking of the way of justification, but of the conduct of justified believers. In like manner, it was commonly adviseable for every man to abide in that profession, trade, or station, in which the grace of God had called him to the knowledge of Christ, provided it were an honest employment. For the Gospel would teach a man how to behave in any condition, and patiently to bear its inconveniences. If then any one had been converted in a state of servitude, even to a heathen master, (which was the common case of the servants in those days,) let him be less solicitous about his liberty, than about glorifying God in that trying situation. But as it would frequently deprive him of religious advantages, especially that of meeting with his brethren on the Lord's day, or at other times, and as it would expose him to many temptations, if he had a fair opportunity of obtaining his freedom, he would do well to embrace it. The converted slave, however, was called to the noblest liberty, as the freedman of Christ, and emancipated from Satan's yoke: and the Christian, who enjoyed his outward liberty, should consider himself as the servant of Christ, his property, and bound to devote himself to him, and obey his will. As therefore all Christians had been bought with an invaluable price to be the Lord's servants, they ought not by choice, or from secular motives, to become the servants of men; because that would interfere with their devoted obedience to their common Lord: so that every man ought contentedly to abide with God, by constantly performing the duties of that situation, in which he was converted to the faith of Christ. As ministers were at that time entirely taken from among the converts to Christ in every Church, many of whom had doubtless been previously employed in other occupations, and as seminaries for educating men for this service were not then known, so, it is evident that the apostle did not mean to forbid that change, when it could be made advisedly and on good grounds, as well as from proper motives; and in other respects his general rule might admit of some exceptions. 'They should not 'change, upon a presumption that Christianity gave them 'a new and peculiar liberty so to do.' (Locke.) The context favours the supposition, that those changes which some might be induced to make, from an erroneous judgment, in respect of their liberty, or duty, as Christians, was the primary object which the apostle had in view: yet his general language seems to imply, that he meant to extend the rule to various other cases. Dr. Whitby and some others explain the words, "Ye are bought with a "price," of those slaves, who had been charitably ransomed at the expense of their fellow-christians. But their fellow-christians obtained no property in them by thus ransoming them, as Christ does by ransoming us; the advice is general, and not limited to these persons; and it is far more obvious to suppose that the apostle used this expression in the same sense in which he had done before. (Note, vi. 18—20.) Abide with God, &c. 'Neither de'serting his master upon pretence of being God's servant, 'nor doing any thing against the laws of God, in obedi'ence to his master.' (Whitby.) It may be added; But serving God by faithfully, diligently, and meekly 'serving 'his master, in all things lawful.'

V. 25—28. The apostle here resumes his former subject, with especial reference to those who had never been married: for he seems to use the word rendered virgins in this latitude, including both young men and young women. Christ had given no commandment in this matter, but had left them free to marry, or not, as they saw good; and the apostle had received no special revelation about it. He did not therefore speak authoritatively; but he gave them counsel, according to the spiritual judgment which he possessed, as one who had obtained mercy to be faithful in his stewardship of divine mysteries; for he ascribed his faithfulness to the compassion and mercy of God, by a very remarkable expression, pitied of God to be faithful. Considering the unsettled state of the Church, and the persecutions to which it was, or might be, exposed, he considered it advantageous to live unmarried; that they might be less encumbered in removing from city to city, and have fewer temptations to shrink from imprisonment and death: and that they might be more disengaged, and 29 But this I say, brethren, [a] the time is short: it remaineth, [b] that both they that have wives be as though they had none;

30 And they [c] that weep, as though they wept not; and they that rejoice, as though they rejoiced not; and they that buy, as though they possessed not;

31 And they that [d] use this world, as not abusing it: [e] for the fashion of this world passeth away.

32 But [f] I would have you without carefulness. [g] He that is unmarried careth for the things that belong to the Lord, how he may please the Lord:

33 But he that is married, [h] careth for the things that are of the world, [i] how he may please his wife.

34 There is difference also between a wife and a virgin: the unmarried woman [k] careth for the things of the Lord, that she may be holy [l] both in body and in spirit: but she that is married careth for the things of the world, how she may please her husband.

35 And this I speak for your own profit; [m] not that I may cast a snare upon you, but for that which is [n] comely, [o] and that ye may attend upon the Lord without distraction.

ready for any service which should be proposed to them for the furtherance of the Gospel, as their anxieties, occupations, attachments, and impediments, would be fewer in the single than in the married state. But if a man were either married, or contracted to a woman under promise of marriage, he ought by no means to attempt the violation of his engagements, in order to possess more liberty for the service of God, though the unmarried might be counselled to avail themselves of their advantages, and not to involve themselves in additional difficulties, during those distressing times. Yet if either man or woman should deem it best, all things considered, to marry, they would break no law of God, and ought not to be blamed for it. Indeed, they would probably have additional outward trouble and suffering; but the apostle would not insist on this, or censure their conduct as imprudent, lest he should deter some from marrying, whose duty it was to marry, or lest he should give occasion to any of representing that state as unholy. (Note, Jer. xvi. 2—4.)

V. 29—31. In speaking on this subject, it was proper that Christians should be reminded of the shortness of life, and the transitory nature of earthly things at all times. "The remainder of their days was short, or contracted, "so that both those," &c. So it is understood by some, who join the words rendered "it remaineth" to the preceding part of the verse. Or, it remained therefore to be observed, that married persons should reflect how speedily their union must be dissolved, that they might sit loose to the satisfactions of that endeared relation, and be habitually prepared for a separation; that they who mourned any temporal loss should moderate their grief; that the prosperous and joyful also should repress their rejoicing, by more serious recollections; that they who were purchasing houses or lands should consider the uncertainty of their tenure, and not deem themselves owners of such fleeting possessions; and that those who were laying out their worldly riches should be careful not to abuse them, or to expect happiness from their pleasures and enjoyments, seeing "the fashion," the whole scheme, form, and show of this world, was passing away, as a pageant or procession through the street, and would soon vanish as a phantom. So that the spirit of a pilgrim and traveller ought in all cases to be maintained. 'To have and use 'these things, as though we had them not, or did not use 'them, is to be moderate in the enjoyment of, not to be 'much affected with them, when we have, or much 'afflicted, when we want or lose, them.' (Whitby.)

V. 32—35. By the preceding counsel the apostle meant to preserve believers from perplexing cares, in that unsettled state of the Church. For he was sensible that an unmarried man, having grace proportioned to his state, and being enabled to live in it superior to its temptations, might wholly employ himself in contriving the best methods of serving and pleasing the Lord; and, not having the charge and expense of a family, he might employ his time, talents, and substance, more entirely in promoting the glory of God, and the good of mankind, and be ready to travel to any part of the world for this purpose, if an opportunity presented itself. But the believer who was married must needs employ more of his thoughts and time about secular concerns, that he might provide for and attend to his family, and render things agreeable and comfortable to his wife, whom he was commanded to love and cherish as his own flesh, and this would exclude him from several active services, to which he might otherwise have been competent. The difference between a virgin and a married woman was of a similar nature; the former might wholly dedicate her time and thoughts, her body and soul, to the service of God, in following after holiness, and in doing good; but the latter must be engaged in the business of the family, and in other duties of her station, according to the will of her husband, whom God had commanded her to obey. So that, though marriage was most suited to men and women in general, yet individuals, who desired peculiar advantages for progress in personal religion, and for doing good, might possess them in an unmarried life, and to such it might be good not to marry, even if the times had been more favourable. This counsel of the apostle was far from countenancing them to shut themselves up in convents, and thus to put the lighted candle under a bushel; on the contrary, it instructed them to "let "their light shine before men," by an uninterrupted series of active services, for the glory of God, and the benefit of the world. Yet he only gave them this counsel for their 36 But if any man think that he behaveth himself uncomely toward his virgin, if she pass [p] the flower of her age, [q] and need so require, let him do what he will, [r] he sinneth not; let them marry.

37 Nevertheless, he that standeth steadfast in his heart having no necessity, but hath power over his own will, and hath so decreed in his heart that he will keep his virgin, doeth well.

38 So then, he that giveth her in marriage [s] doeth well; but he that giveth her not in marriage [t] doeth better.

39 The [u] wife is bound by the law as long as her husband liveth; but if her husband be dead, she is at liberty to be married to whom she will; [x] only in the Lord.

profit, and would not by any means cast a snare on them, by persuading those to a single life, who had not a sufficient command over their own passions. He meant not that this was required of them, but that in some cases it would be comely, and enable them to wait upon God in his ordinances and commandments, without having their thoughts or affections divided or distracted by other cares or attachments.

V. 36—38. Hitherto the apostle's meaning has been evident, but these verses are not without difficulty. Some explain them of a man's resolutely continuing in a single state, supposing "the necessity" mentioned to be matter of personal consciousness, and not any thing arising from the conduct of another; but such a construction of the original is, by their own allowance, without example. Others would refer them to the case of a man who had betrothed a virgin, and was in doubt whether he should complete the marriage; but to marry is not the same as to give in marriage. It seems therefore most obvious to explain the passage of a parent, or guardian, who had the charge of a virgin. If such a one thought that he acted unsuitably, in letting the virgin live single till she had passed the prime of her life, and if any attachment, or other circumstance, rendered it needful, let him determine as he saw good, or, as it may be rendered, "as she willeth," without supposing it sinful to allow her to marry. But, on the other hand, if a man was established in his judgment, that it was best for his daughter, or ward, to remain unmarried in such evil times, and if he saw no necessity from any thing in her behaviour, disposition or attachments, to deviate from his own inclinations respecting her, and he so determined in his mind to keep her unmarried, he did well. So that the parent or guardian, who gave a virgin in marriage to a proper person, did well, and was by no means to be blamed, though she might thereby be exposed to additional difficulties in those unsettled times, on which account, he who did not give his daughter, or ward, in marriage, did better; that is, he acted more for her real advantage, provided she was satisfied in a single state.

V. 39, 40. The law was still in force, which bound the wife to her husband as long as he lived, (that is, except when legally divorced for a sufficient reason,) but afterwards she might without sin marry any other man, provided he were a Christian, and, in the judgment of charity, a true believer. The apostle, however, judged that widows would be happier, if they continued in that condition, in the present state of the Church; and, whatever some of the Corinthians might suppose, he thought himself to be guided by the Holy Spirit, in giving these counsels and instructions. The language employed in several places of this chapter has led most expositors to conclude, that the apostle did not write by inspiration in the particulars referred to; and doubtless these intimations, thus understood, would rather prove, than invalidate, his immediate inspiration in other parts of his writings. Yet there seems no sufficient ground for the distinction; sometimes he spoke by way of permission, concerning what was allowable; sometimes by way of counsel, concerning what was adviseable; and at other times by commandment, concerning what was absolutely binding on their consciences. But in all this he might be, and doubtless was, guided by the Spirit of inspiration.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—9.

That which is good in itself may not always be best for a man, when all circumstances are weighed, and all the variety of inward evils and outward temptations, connected with it, are duly considered. So that those things which are good for one, may not so much as be recommended to another, because he is incapable of overcoming the difficulties to which they expose him. For, though none may be dispensed with in breaking the divine law, even that perfect rule leaves men at liberty to serve God in that way which is most suited to their capacity and various circumstances, of which others are often incompetent judges. Thus, if they who find advantages for serving God in the single state, imagine that others might do the same, they show themselves to be ignorant of the situation of fallen man in this ensnaring world; for there is no doubt but many, who, from various motives, live unmarried, experience that circumstance to be a great hinderance to them in respect of their souls, and are unable, or unwilling, to persevere in that kind of celibacy, which the apostle describes as good. To prevent therefore the fatal effects of unchastity, it is generally expedient, and always allowable, that "every man should have his own "wife, and every woman her own husband:" all restrictions of this allowance uniformly tend to licentiousness; and no tongue can express the mischiefs which arise from covetous, licentious, and constrained celibacy. Every part of the conduct of married persons also ought to be so regulated, as to render them agreeable to and satisfied with each other. Whatever therefore, on either side, tends to give Satan an opportunity of tempting the other party to any of those evils which marriage was instituted to prevent, or to render it ineffectual for any of those ends for which the Creator appointed it, must be highly criminal, under whatever specious pretence it may be done, and the offending party is answerable to God for the consequences of the deviation from his commandments. For not only adultery and polygamy are inconsistent with the duties of this relation, and with the mutual property of married persons in each other, but also whatever is disobliging, and tends to weaken the attachment, and to open the way for either of them to look with more satisfaction on another object. Every thing in the Christian's conduct should be regulated in subserviency to his communion with God. Abstinence, and abstraction from lawful indulgences, may for a time be greatly subservient to that end; yet, when carried beyond proper bounds, they often produce contrary effects, and give Satan peculiar advantages against us. They, who, like the apostle, are enabled to live with purity and contentment in an unmarried state, should copy his example, by laying themselves out with double diligence to glorify God, and to be useful to mankind; they should also imitate his prudence and candour, in not prescribing to others, or despising others, who are not endued with the same gift, remembering that in this also God had made them to differ. In counselling others, we should use caution, lest, by exciting a man to grasp at advantages which are out of his reach, we should cast him into circumstances of insuperable temptation, urge him to that which is contrary to his duty, and dissuade him from what is best for him, and indeed incumbent on him; for, in such matters, no man is competent to judge for another, but every one must determine for himself or rather he ought to seek counsel from God, how he ought to act.

V. 10—17.

Is is the express commandment of God, that married persons should not separate from each other, if it can possibly be avoided; and that such as have separated should endeavour to be reconciled, or else live single. It is also his will, that husbands and wives should be careful to please each other in lawful things, though it leave them less time for religious exercises, than they enjoyed in a single state. Even if a believer hath been married to an unbeliever, either before conversion, or by inattention to the rule of the sacred word, the cross of that incongruous union must be patiently endured, and the duties of the relation cheerfully performed; that by kindness, by a good example, and by fervent prayers, the unbelieving party may be won over, and the immortal soul saved. Nor need any doubt, but that, even in that case, the marriage state is sanctified to them; and they may still hope that their children would be made partakers of the spiritual grace, as well as the outward sign, of baptism, by means of their redoubled diligence to "bring them up in the nurture and "admonition of the Lord." In every state and relation, we should remember that God hath called us to peace: and that every thing should be done to promote domestic and social harmony, as far as truth and holiness will permit.

V. 13—24. 29—31.

It is proper that every man should walk with God, according to the gift distributed to him, and the duties of his station in the community. Believers should not show an inconstant and unsettled temper. Even a disposition to change from one sect to another, on frivolous pretences, is frequently injurious and dishonourable; for these generally are as nothing, compared with that cheerful obedience to God's commandments, which both evidences our faith in Christ, and recommends his Gospel to others. So superior are a believer's privileges to all temporal things, that even the want of personal liberty, the most valuable of earthly blessings, should not much disquiet him; nor ought he to be careful about it, though called to serve God in a state of slavery. If the Son of God has made him free from sin and Satan, he has a far nobler liberty, even in bondage, than his unconverted master ever formed an idea of. The lowest condition of his freedmen is honourable; and, being "bought with a price," we are all his servants, and should abide with God in our proper place and work, well satisfied with his appointment, and not desirous of a change, unless a substantial reason can be given for it: nor ought a believer so to attach himself to any man, from secular motives, as to restrict himself from his liberty in the service of God. But whatever our state or service, may be, we should remember that the time is short; our temporal comforts and trials will soon be terminated; our season of preparation or of usefulness will speedily expire. Let us then study to sit loose to earthly satisfactions, to bear up under temporal sorrows; to be sober and considerate in prosperity, and cheerful in adversity; to deem heaven our sole inheritance, and "to use the things of the world, as "not abusing them, seeing the fashion" of this vain world is passing away like a shadow. Thus we may be helped forward by them in our pilgrimage, kept out of the way of temptation, and enabled to serve God and our generation to better advantage, as we pass through the world to heaven.

V. 25—28. 32—40.

They who have obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful, and who have most studied the word of God and human nature, will be the most candid and cautious in giving their judgment, or passing their censures; for whatever may be good, in respect of present difficulties or peculiar circumstances, they know that marriage is honourable, and fornication is abominable, in all persons and circumstances. They will therefore be careful not to speak as if marriage were sinful in any, and not to throw a snare upon those that pay deference to their judgment. And though they foresee that others will have trouble in the flesh, by marrying in certain circumstances, and might in some respects be happier in a single state; yet they will spare them, without attempting to restrict the liberty which God hath allowed, or condemning them for what they do conscientiously. They will only counsel them for their profit, and to what is comely, and that they may serve God without distraction. Great discretion is also needful for parents and guardians, in their conduct respecting young persons, that they do not, by laying down rules and making determinations, according to their views of what is most for their interest, lead them into dangerous temptations; for it may be doing well to permit young persons to marry, when their attachment or inclinations are that way; when otherwise, it would be doing better to prevent them; as even apparent imprudence, and its troubles, are better than sin and its effects. How absurd, then, must vows of celibacy and perpetual virginity be! especially in young persons, and perhaps at the instance of others! The probable consequence of them will be, either the violation of the vows, or a life spent amidst temptation and mental defilement, or still worse. This was man's policy. How different from the wisdom of God, even in this chapter, which contains in it more in favour of a single life, than all the rest of the Scripture taken together does! Believers, when under no other restriction, should be sure, in contracting marriage, to remember that of the apostle, "only in the Lord." What miseries have many endured through the remnant of their lives, and what bad consequences have they entailed upon their families, by transgressing it on some vain pretence or other!

NOTES.

CHAP. VIII. V. 1—6. It is probable that the Corinthians had proposed another question, concerning the lawfulness of Christians eating the flesh of those animals which had been sacrificed to idols. It was customary with the idolaters to feast on these oblations, both in the temples and in their own houses, and many of them were publicly sold in the shambles. On this flesh several of the Christians at Corinth would feast without scruple; declaring that they knew the idol to be a mere senseless log, and the supposed deity represented by it a mere nonentity. This was, in some respects, taken from a misunderstanding of these Scriptures, which speak of idols as vanity. They therefore imagined that it was an evidence of superior knowledge, to eat of such sacrifices, even in the very temples of the idol! Now, says the apostle, we know that all of us, who are acquainted with the Gospel, have this kind and measure of knowledge; but we are also aware, that these speculations puff men up in a vain conceit of their superior abilities and attainments, and foster a haughty, self-sufficient, unteachable temper, which is diametrically opposite to genuine Christianity, and prevents a man from making any progress in spiritual and experimental knowledge and wisdom; whereas holy affections, and love to God, to heavenly things, and to the brethren, prepare men for receiving further instruction, and tend to their edification. If any one therefore presumed that he knew any thing pre-eminently, and so despised warnings and instructions, he certainly knew nothing in that holy, humble, and sanctifying manner, wherein he ought to know God, and his truth and will. (iii. 18.) But, on the other hand, if any man really loved God, valued his favour, and sought his glory, he was thus evidenced to be known and approved of God, even though his speculative knowledge were comparatively little; or, (as some render it,) "God was known of him," in a saying manner. (Note. John xvii. 3.) In respect therefore of the question, it might be allowed, as well known among Christians, that an idol had no real existence, further than the senseless image, which specifically represented nothing in the world; for there were no such deities as those to whom the temples were consecrated; (though Satan and evil spirits were virtually worshipped in them all;) and that there was but one true and living God. The Gentiles indeed had many deities, celestial, terrestrial, and infernal; superior and inferior, who were adored as independent gods, or as constituted lords and mediators; yet Christians knew that there was but one God, even the Father; of whom, as the self-existent Author of all things, every creature proceeds, in whom all Christians had their spiritual life and happiness, and unto whom they were devoted; and one Lord Jesus Christ, the appointed Mediator between God and man, the Lord of his redeemed people, and of all things for their benefit; by whom all things at first were created, and by whom believers were redeemed and reconciled to God. The Lord Jesus cannot here be spoken of, in respect of his original nature, as if inferior to the Father, any more than in those texts, which speak of his mediatorial Person, character, office, and authority. The One God, even the Father, signifies the Godhead, as the sole Object of all religious worship: and the Lord Jesus Christ denotes the Person of Emmanuel, God manifest in the flesh, One with the Father and One with us, the appointed Mediator and Lord of all: through whom we come to the Father, and through whom the Father communicates all blessings to us, by the influences and operations of the Holy Spirit. So that this passage proves, that Christ the Mediator is the Object of our worship, as One with the Father and the Spirit, in the unity of the Godhead; and as opposed to all other pretenders to divine adoration.

V. 7—13. Christians, who were matured in knowledge and judgment, knew indeed that an idol was the senseless representative of a nominal deity, which had no existence: and many of the Corinthians, being puffed up with a groundless conceit of their own superior attainments, boasted of their knowledge in this respect, and assigned it as the reason of their conduct, in partaking of the sacrifices even in the temples of the idols. But, had there been no other reasons why they should refrain from doing this, (which the apostle afterwards purposed to consider, (Note, x. 18—22,) regard to their weaker brethren should have sufficed. For not every professed Christian, no, nor every true believer, had this knowledge: so that some of them, even to that time, ventured to eat of the idol-sacrifices, who retained a superstitious regard to the supposed invisible object of worship. They had an impression upon their minds, that they were joining in an idolatrous sacrifice, and thus through weakness their consciences were defiled. Now, for what purpose did the Corinthians thus lead their brethren into temptation and sin? Meat, of whatever kind, did not recommend them to God, or give them any religious advantages above those who abstained from it, whether out of scruples of conscience, or regard to their brethren. They ought therefore to be far more cautious and circumspect, in using, what they considered as their liberty and privilege; and not to act in such a self-confident and imprudent manner, as tended to seduce those into sin, who were weak and unconfirmed in the faith. For if a person of this description saw a Christian, who had the reputation of superior knowledge, sit at meat in the idol's temple, he would be encouraged to follow his example; and induced to do that which either brought on him the guilt of acting against the dictates of his own conscience by eating, while he doubted the lawfulness of so doing; or to commit real idolatry, through an erroneous conscience, thus emboldened to think, that it was not inconsistent with Christianity to pay some degree of regard to those idols, which they had been used to worship. The word, translated emboldened, is literally edified: and thus the apostle intimated, that instead of edifying their weaker brethren, in their most holy faith, by their example and endeavours, they were confirming them in the superstitious regard, which in some degree they still retained for idols, and even inducing them to join in those idolatrous rites, by which the worshippers had "fellowship with devils." Thus their knowledge, of which they made so ostentatious a display, directly tended to the ruin of those for whom Christ died, and, whatever might be the event, through the special grace of God preventing the fatal consequence, yet, by thus giving a wound, mortal in its nature, to a member of Christ's mystical body, they committed a very heinous sin against the Saviour himself, which would not pass without severe rebukes. On this account, the apostle declared, that rather than thus cause his weak brother to offend, or thus displease his gracious Lord, he would to the end of his life eat only vegetables, and taste flesh no more for ever. (Note, Rom. xiv. 15.) The word rendered weak, often means sick or diseased; and some learned men explain these verses, not of a doubting conscience, but of an erroneous conscience; that is, not of one who ate, though he doubted the lawfulness of so doing; but of one, who erroneously thought he might lawfully partake of the sacrifices, with some degree of regard to the idol, and in expectation of some advantage to himself or family. And indeed, considering the inveterate habits of such as had been brought up, and perhaps grown old, in idolatry, and likewise the corrupt state of the Corinthian Church, it is not unlikely that some professed Christians retained a hankering after their former usages; especially, as feasting with their neighbours and relations, on these occasions, would in part exempt them from reproach and persecution. The apostle, however, by "a weak brother," seems particularly to mean the man with a doubting conscience; not him with the erroneous one, at least, not exclusively.

CHAP. IX.

The apostle asserts and proves his authority, 1—3; and shows that the ministers of the Gospel have a right to marry, and, with their families, to be supported by the people, 4—14: yet he had not availed himself of this right; and had in many things waived the exercise of his liberty, to promote the salvation of souls, 15—23. He proposes to them the example of his exceeding earnestness in securing an incorruptible crown, 24—27.

Dr. Whitby, after endeavouring to refute the argument which some drew from these verses against conformity to the ceremonies of the Church of England, because they doubted the lawfulness of so doing, makes the following important remark: 'Nevertheless, this seemeth to press 'hard on them, who believe that the schism of such weak 'persons will finally tend to their ruin, and render them 'exiles from the flock of Christ, and yet for things indif'ferent, will, in that dreadful sense, cause their weak bro'ther to offend: since this they do, for that "which com"mends them not to God," 'which doing they are not the 'better, or omitting they are not the worse. For if schism 'and idolatry be equally damnable, and equally cause my 'brother to offend, and him to perish for whom Christ 'died, we are equally to take heed in both cases, lest our 'power, to do the thing indifferent, become a stumbling 'block to the weak, or the erroneous, in their judgment of 'these things. For let men imagine what other differ'ence they please in the case, while the sad issue or event 'is in general the same, to wit the perishing of my bro'ther, and my power to have abstained from that which 'through his erroneous conscience gave occasion to it, is 'the same, I fear the guilt will be the same.' This cannot easily be answered by those, who think nonconformity a fatal schism, and yet require things allowedly indifferent as terms of conformity.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

◆

Satan as effectually injures some men's souls by tempting them to be proud of their intellectual powers, as he does those of others by alluring them to the grossest sensualities. That knowledge, therefore, which puffeth up the possessor, and renders him self-confident, dogmatical, and unteachable, is as dangerous, at least, as self-righteous pride; even though a pure evangelical creed be the object of it: and they, who are elated, because they thus know much about the truth, know nothing yet as they ought to know, and need to be sent to school to learn the first rudiments of heavenly wisdom. For without holy affections and divine love, all human knowledge is worthless, and far beneath the attainments of apostate angels: but sanctified affections, and humble grateful love, are not only evidences of the Lord's merciful acceptance, but are important steps to 'good understanding in the way of godliness.' The proud speculator is probably at the top of his attainments: but the loving disciple, though comparatively ignorant, shall daily be edified and make progress in heavenly wisdom; so that he shall be abundantly enriched from the fulness of Christ. While we refuse all kinds and degrees of worship to the many, that are called gods and lords, and to those saints and angels, which antichristianity hath devised for mediators, remembering, that "to us there is one "God, even the Father, of whom are all things, and one "Lord Jesus Christ, by whom are all things," let us examine whether we really come to God by faith in the divine Saviour: whether we be spiritual worshippers of the living and true God, according to his word.

V. 7—13.

If our evidence of conversion is clear and decisive, and our views distinct and satisfactory, let us bless God for the consolation; but let us not suppose that this measure of knowledge and assurance is vouchsafed to all believers: or that we are better in ourselves, or more beloved of God, than our weaker brethren, the younger children of the same family. Let us beware of self-preference, vain-glory, and self-indulgence, and of despising those who are disquieted by needless scruples; who, though less conformable, may serve God more conscientiously and humbly than we do. Such Christians as have knowledge, should also beware of abusing their liberty, and of approaching to the verge or appearance of evil; "lest by "any means this liberty of theirs should prove an occa"sion of stumbling others," if not of guilt to themselves. For, should a weak believer see one, who is reputed to have knowledge, sitting at some of those feasts, or in some of those places of public concourse, for which many plead, (perhaps as plausibly as the Corinthians in behalf of eating in the idol's temple,) might he not be tempted to do the same, though contrary to the convictions of his own conscience? And thus, through such a man's knowledge and carnal self-indulgence, would the soul of a weak believer, for whom Christ died, be endangered, and his conscience wounded; or one, who was beginning to inquire after salvation, might be turned aside and utterly perish. How can men thus sin against their brethren, and violate the law of love, without offending Christ and endangering their own souls too; seeing they act so contrary to the spirit of the apostle, who would have eaten no flesh to the end of life, rather than cause his weak brother to offend; and to the mind of Him, who shed his precious blood, and poured out his dying prayers, for his misguided murderers?

NOTES.

CHAP. IX. V. 1—3. Some expositors seem to think that the apostle here began a new subject, and entered upon a formal vindication of his conduct among the Corinthians; but he appears rather to have digressed from his subject, in order to illustrate it by his own example, &c.; and accordingly he resumed and concluded it in the next chapter. He had before declared his readiness to deny himself the eating of flesh, during the remainder of his life, rather than stumble his weak brother; and he here proceeded to show what he had actually done in this respect, to promote the Gospel. But in order to state this clearly, it was necessary to prove his apostolical office, and that he had a right to a maintenance and other privileges in that character. He therefore inquired, Whether he were not an apostle; and whether he too were not free as well as the Corinthians, if he chose to exercise his liberty. Indeed he was aware that some of them would question his apostleship; but could they deny that he had seen the Lord Jesus, who repeatedly appeared to him, that he might be an unexceptionable witness of his resurrection and glory? And were not they his work in the Lord, who, by employing his ministry for their conversion, had affixed his seal to his apostolical commission? For he certainly would not thus have attested a direct imposture. So that they were the last persons, who ought to have made a doubt of this, being themselves the seal and demonstration of it. This therefore might serve as a brief, but sufficient, answer to those, who examined him concerning the credentials of his commission. Mine answer, &c. (3.) ‘ Namely, what is ‘ said in the preceding verse: therefore this is improperly ‘ by some joined to the next verse. He adds this by the ‘ way, as if he had said, So far should you be from doubt‘ ing of my apostleship; that I am used to answer those, ‘ who call that in question, by declaring what the Lord ‘ hath by me done among you.’ (Beza.)

V. 4, 5. It being then determined, that he was the apostle of Christ: he next inquired, whether he had not an indisputable right to eat and drink at their expense. And even whether he had not the privilege or liberty of marrying a believing woman, and of taking her along with him in his travels; receiving from the Churches a maintenance for her and his family also. This several of the apostles did; especially Peter, the apostle of the circumcision, who was attended by his wife when he went to different places to preach the Gospel. The words "a sister, a wife," are so determinate, that they leave no doubt but several of the apostles were married, and took their wives with them to those places, where they more statedly resided. To render them a sister, a woman, as some do, would form an unmeaning tautology, or rather one calculated to mislead the reader: for a sister must be a woman; and the latter word would be wholly redundant, if not intended to show in what relation she was supposed to stand; namely, that of a wife, according to the general acceptation of the word. ‘ This declares, in effect, that St. Peter continued to live ‘ with his wife after he became an apostle; and also that ‘ St. Peter had no rights, as an apostle, which were not ‘ common to St. Paul. A remark utterly subversive of ‘ popery, if traced to its obvious consequences.’ (Doddridge.) ‘ Clemens of Alexandria not only saith, that he ‘ that marrieth hath the apostles as examples, and that St. ‘ Peter carried his wife with him till his martyrdom; ‘ but confutes the enemies of martyrdom from these words. ‘ Adding, that they carried about their wives, not as ‘ wives, but as sisters, to minister to those who were mis‘ tresses of families, that so the doctrine of the Lord ‘ might, without any apprehension, or evil suspicions, en‘ ter into the apartments of the women.’ (Whitby.) The former part of this quotation shows what the records, or tradition, of the Church in that century was; the latter is a proof how soon antichristian notions about marriage began to prevail.

V. 6. The apostle further inquired, whether he and Barnabas alone were destitute of the right of being supported, without earning their bread by labour. These two useful servants of Christ were called to the apostolical office after the ascension of Christ, and set out together to preach among the Gentiles. The circumstances in which they found themselves, probably led them to adopt the method of subsisting by their own labour, in order to promote the Gospel; and they both persevered in it after they separated: while the other apostles, setting out among the Jews, who had been used to support their teachers, were generally maintained by them without working; and were supplied when they journeyed to other places, where Churches had not been planted. Thus Paul and Barnabas, by not requiring a support, seemed to have lost their right to one; and were generally left to labour, and struggle with difficulties and necessities, for want of adequate assistance. This view of these verses renders their connexion with the foregoing chapter very clear. The apostle was preparing to show the Corinthians how he waived the exercise of his liberty, in order to do good; that they might see, as in a glass, the impropriety of their selfish exercise of their liberty, "in eating the things offered unto idols."

10 Or saith he it altogether for our sakes? [z] for our sakes, no doubt, this is written: [a] that he that ploweth should plow in hope; and that he that thresheth in hope should be partaker of his hope.

11 If we have [b] sown unto you spiritual things, is it [c] a great thing if we shall reap your carnal things?

12 If [d] others be partakers of this power over you, [e] are not we rather? [f] nevertheless we have not used this power; [g] but suffer all things, lest we should [h] hinder the Gospel of Christ.

13 Do ye not know that [i] they which minister about holy things * live of the things of the temple? and they which wait at the altar are partakers with the altar?

14 Even so hath the Lord [k] ordained that they which preach the Gospel should live of the Gospel.

15 But [l] I have used none of these things: [m] neither have I written these things, that it should be so done unto me: [n] for it were better for me to die, than that any man should make my glorying void.

16 For though I preach the Gospel, [o] I have nothing to glory of: [p] for necessity is laid upon me; yea, [q] wo is unto me, if I preach not the Gospel.

17 For [r] if I do this thing willingly, I [s] have a reward: but if [t] against my will, [u] a dispensation of the Gospel is committed unto me.

18 What is my reward then? Verily that, [x] when I preach the Gospel, I may make the Gospel of Christ without charge,

V. 7—12. Had the Corinthians objected, that St. Paul, by not receiving a maintenance from them, seemed to allow that he was not an apostle, as some suppose; it would have been needless for him formally to prove his right to it: but this was absolutely necessary, if he meant tacitly to instruct them, by his example, to give up their right and self-indulgence, from love to their brethren. He first shows, that he, as well as other ministers of the Gospel, had a right to a maintenance on the principles of natural equity: for who expected others to employ their time, strength, and skill, in their service, without affording them a support? The soldier, when fighting for his country, being thereby deprived of the opportunity of attending to his private concerns, had his charges borne by the state. The person, employed in planting a vineyard, was allowed a maintenance from its produce: and he who tended a flock, was used to eat the milk of the flock. And who could think it equitable to refuse them this recompense for their labour? Ought not therefore the ministers of the Gospel, who gave up other prospects of supporting themselves and their families, that they might with great peril and hardship promote the spiritual good of others, to be maintained in a decent and comfortable manner by them? 'Chrysostom and Theophylact observe, 'that he saith not, Who goeth to warfare, and is not rich? 'Who plants a vineyard, and heaps not up gold of the 'fruits of it? Who feeds a flock, and makes not a merchandise of the sheep? Teaching us, that the spiritual 'pastor should be content with little, and seek only what 'is necessary, not what is superfluous.' (Whitby.) Was this merely the dictate of human reason? Verily the law gave an emblematical intimation of it, when it forbade the Israelites to muzzle the ox, which was employed in treading out the grain. (Deut. xxv. 4.) If the ox must not be refused a share of that abundance, which men enjoyed through its labour, surely the laborious and patient minister should be supported by those, who received far richer blessings by his instrumentality. For could it be supposed, that God made such particular laws from a regard to oxen? He indeed required men to be merciful to the beasts, and his providential care and bounty extend to all creatures; yet doubtless this prohibition was entirely given for the sake of the human species, that none should receive his neighbour's service without wages: and especially for the sake of ministers, that they should be supported in a suitable manner, as a recompense for their useful and affectionate labours. Thus, when endeavouring to propagate the Gospel among Gentiles, or when labouring amidst great hardship and necessities among unconverted persons, where no support could be expected, any more than the oxen had when plowing the ground, they might be encouraged, by the hope of future maintenance, to persevere in the work; and, when employed in furthering the joy and growth of believers, they might be partakers of the expected recompense, and have some refreshment and relief after their hardships, by a comfortable maintenance, as the oxen eat of the corn, when treading it out for the benefit of others. And, indeed, if the ministers of Christ had sown the spiritual seed of the word of God, which was about to produce, for the benefit of the people, the excellent and permanent fruits of salvation, ought they to deem it a great matter, a large expense to themselves, or a great favour to their ministers, if they allowed them to reap a portion of their carnal things; which were of an earthly nature, and could not long be preserved, and which would prove them carnal, if they either tenaciously hoarded them, or luxuriously spent them on themselves? If then other pastors, and even the false teachers at Corinth, had been allowed to partake of this privilege, or authority over them, much more was this due to the apostle and his helpers, who first preached the Gospel among them. Nevertheless, they had not availed themselves of this their undoubted right; but had chosen rather to endure labour, pinching want, and every extremity, than to prevent the success of the Gospel: yet the Corinthians would not abridge themselves of the indulgence of a luxurious meal, out of love to their weaker brethren! This is evidently the contrast intended.

[y] that I abuse not my power in the Gospel.

19 For though [z] I be free from all men, yet have [a] I made myself servant unto all, [b] that I might gain the more.

20 And [c] unto the Jews I became as a Jew, that I might gain the Jews; to them that are [d] under the law, as under the law, that I might gain them that are under the law:

21 To [e] them that are without law, as without law, (being [f] not without law to God, but under the law to Christ,) that I might gain them that are without law.

22 To [g] the weak became I as weak, that I might gain the weak: [h] I am made all things to all men, that I might by all means [i] save some.

23 And this I do [k] for the Gospel's sake, [l] that I might be partaker thereof with you.

V. 13—18. The apostle here adduced another proof of his right to a maintenance among them. They could not but know, that the priests and Levites, who attended on the worship of the temple, (and so spent their time in that service as not to be at leisure for those employments, by which the other Israelites supported themselves and their families,) were maintained from the first fruits, oblations, and sacrifices, there presented; in like manner the Lord Jesus had appointed, that the ministers of his Gospel should be supported by the people for their services in this sacred function, and not be obliged to engage in any other. (Matt. x. 10.) Some expositors argue, from the apostle's frequent reference to the law, that the judaizing teachers were his chief opponents at Corinth. Yet the contrary is evident; and doubtless all professed Christians would become acquainted with, and might properly be referred to, the holy Scriptures, which are replete in every part with instructions to us at this day, though no one thinks of obeying the ceremonial law. The Corinthians, however, well knew, that he had not insisted upon his right in any of these things, nor did he thus write to them, in order to induce them to raise him an income; on the contrary, he deemed himself to have such a ground of glorying, (though not before God, yet with them,) in this self-denying disinterested conduct, that he should account it more desirable to die of want, than, by receiving any thing from them, to render it void. Probably, he had seen some things in the disposition of the Corinthians, which first induced him to decline receiving any thing from them. What had passed since he left them still more confirmed him in his purpose: he thought himself unkindly used by them, and in this way only would he show them his sense of their misconduct. He knew that the false teachers wanted an occasion against him; but this disinterestedness gave him an advantage over them, and it was very important that his example should be contrasted with their own conduct; which he could not so properly have done, had he not previously determined to receive nothing from the Christians at Corinth. Indeed, he had nothing to glory in, (though he had faithfully preached the Gospel,) as peculiarly expressive of his zeal and love, and which he might oppose to the vain-glorious boasts of false teachers. For he had been called to this work in so singular a manner, that a necessity was laid upon him, and he could not decline the service, or execute it unfaithfully, without incurring the heaviest condemnation. If indeed he had, without an express command, (having previously embraced the Gospel,) deliberately and willingly engaged in the work of the ministry, from love to Christ and to the souls of sinners, and zeal for the glory of God, he might have been assured of a gracious and abundant recompense. But, as he was so wonderfully arrested, when violently persecuting the Church, and intrusted with a dispensation to preach the Gospel, without any previous choice or willingness, a line of conduct of a peculiar nature was requisite for him, in order to show that he was not actuated by slavish fear, or mercenary principles. For if this had been the case, where would have been his reward? (Notes, Matt. vi. 1—5. 16—18.) Or how could he, in his peculiar circumstances, distinguish himself from mercenary teachers, and thus have ground of glorying, through the grace of God, in this distinction? Or how might he possess the assurance of a reward? Truly, by preaching the Gospel freely, without putting his hearers to any expense; and by enduring poverty, hunger, and labour, rather than make an inexpedient and improper use of his liberty and privilege, as an apostle of Christ. Thus he evidenced that he acted from genuine principles of zeal and love, and so enjoyed much comfort and assurance of hope in his own soul. To insist on our due, and use our liberty, when this hinders our usefulness, is to "abuse "our power in the Gospel."

V. 19—23. The preceding instance was not the only one, in which the apostle thus denied himself. Though he was free from obligation to comply with other men's inclinations, or to conform to their customs, yet he had voluntarily become as a slave to all men, or to men of every nation, rank or religious opinion; by renouncing every personal consideration, and making allowance for their prejudices, mistakes, and infirmities, as far as he could consistently with his duty, in order that he might win over the more to the faith of Christ. So that he conversed among the unconverted Jews, as though he had considered the Mosaic law to be still in force; he had circumcised Timothy, that he might give them no offence; and he paid that regard to their rules, which consisted with his duty as the apostle of the Gentiles, without regarding the trouble and self-denial of so doing. Thus he endeavoured to win upon them to attend to his doctrine, for their good. Even to the Jewish converts, who still deemed themselves under the authority of the ritual law, he became as one of them; and joined with them in their worship and purifications, as far as he could without misleading them, in order that he might soften their prejudices and be made useful to them. He conversed as freely among the Gentiles, as if he had been unacquainted with the law of Moses, in order that he might win them over to embrace the Gospel. Yet did he not disregard the authority and commands of God, but considered himself to be "under the law to Christ," bound to receive the moral law from his hand as a rule of duty, taught by his grace to love it and delight in it; and, being delivered from its curse, engaged by additional motives to yield a prompt obedience to it. In like manner he condescended to the infirmities and scruples of the weak in faith, as if he too had been weak; abridging himself of his liberty, lest he should grieve or ensnare them, without making any ostentation of stronger faith or greater knowledge, or showing any neglect or contempt of them. Thus, in all things lawful, he became all things to all men, by an habitual, cheerful, patient endurance of their infirmities, and toleration of their prejudices and mistakes in things unessential; that, by every means which he could devise, he might save some from the several descriptions of men among whom he laboured. This he did from love to the Gospel and a valuation of its blessings; that he might not only be a partaker of them himself, but that he might share them with numerous converts, and especially with the Corinthians; not being satisfied, as it were, to be saved himself, without he could prevail for the salvation of others also. Nothing could be more suited to shame them out of a selfish use of their liberty, than this statement of his own principles and conduct; or more strongly mark the surprising change which had taken place in him since the time, when, by cruel persecution, he wanted to make all men conform to his religion.

V. 24—27. To illustrate his subject, the apostle called their attention to the Isthmian games, which were celebrated near Corinth. Did they not well know, that though several racers set out to run for the prize, yet it was only awarded to the victorious person, and the rest were disappointed? This induced each of them to exert himself to the uttermost, in order to be successful. Let then the Corinthians do the same in their Christian course; let them run with earnestness, self-denial, and patience, without shrinking from hardships or perils, and without loitering from attention to worldly allurements; that they might obtain the prize, which self-indulgent professors would come short of. They well knew that every man, who contended in those athletic exercises, must prepare himself for them by rule, in respect of his diet, and all other things. This would, in many cases, require peculiar temperance and self-denial; without which they could not expect to succeed. Now, they submitted to this for a garland of herbs, or ever-greens, which would soon wither and decay, even as the honour annexed to them must be very transient; but Christians contended with the enemies of their salvation, in hopes of obtaining an incorruptible crown of glory and felicity; and surely they ought not to shrink from any self-denial or suffering. For his part, the apostle could truly say, that he did not so run in this race as to leave the event of it uncertain, or as willing to be left among the obscure undistinguished multitude of losers. Nor did he fight as the pugilists used to exercise themselves, when their blows only beat the air, having no opponent to contend with; but as they did when actually engaged in the contest. Thus he got the better of his animal inclinations; as they used to subdue their antagonists, when by violent blows they beat them down to the ground, and kept them under till they yielded the victory. For he not only refused his appetites unlawful or inexpedient indulgences, but he habituated them to brook denial in every thing, when there was a call to it; and he inured his body to hard labour and patient sufferings, and thus wore it out, of which the marks and scars might be visible to every one. In this way he sought and possessed the assurance, that he should not, after having preached to others, (like the heralds who called the combatants to the conflict,) be himself rejected, as having no title to the incorruptible crown. This did not imply that the apostle at all doubted of his acceptance or perseverance; but it showed the Corinthians the nature of his assurance, and forcibly cautioned them not to rest in such hopes, as were consistent with indiscriminate self-indulgence even in things lawful. He had abundant occasions and methods of thus bringing and keeping under his body, without using the tortures, austerities, and flagellations of the papists; while he willingly endured hunger, thirst, fatigue, and imprisonment in preaching the Gospel, and was frequently in watchings, fastings, and prayers, as well as habitually temperate in all things. The apostle seems designedly to contrast the continence and temperance of the heathen combatants, for a fading crown, with the luxurious self-indulgence of the Corinthian Christians, whom no motives, either taken from the good of their brethren, their own spiritual advantage, or the honour of the Gospel, could induce to deny themselves the gratification of a sensual feast. "The body," seems here to be meant literally. The depraved nature, "the body of sin "and death," must be crucified as a malefactor; but the body, or animal frame, must, by wholesome and sometimes sharp discipline, be brought under, and kept under, as a well educated child.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

scientious in respect of their own call to the work, and be deemed a sufficient proof to others, especially to those converted by them; though no occasional usefulness will prove an unholy man to be a real Christian, or a self-confident boaster to be a faithful minister. However expedient the single life may be in some cases, yet marriage not only consists with the office of a stated pastor, but with that of a missionary or an evangelist, as it did with that of the holy apostles: and though ministers may see good, in some circumstances, to labour for their bread, yet they have an undoubted right to a decent maintenance for themselves and their families; whether natural equity or the word of God be appealed to. They who judge it best not to use this power are the most proper persons to enforce the equity of it; as they may do it with less suspicion of wrong motives; and as otherwise their conduct might be misconstrued to the disadvantage of their brethren. Nor ought they, who reap the spiritual benefit of the minister's labours, to yield a proportion of their temporal goods, as if it were an alms, or a great favour conferred on him; for it is at least as much his due, as the soldier's or the labourer's wages. How should it be expected that men will give up the prospect of lucrative employments and creditable professions, to engage in this warfare, to labour in the Lord's husbandry, or to feed his flock, if they cannot do it in hope of living by their profession? How can they face the dangers and endure the hardships of plowing up the fallow ground, by preaching to the ignorant, careless, and profligate, if pinching want be their only prospect, however diligent and successful they may be? Or how can they minister to the comfort and edification of believers, when they are burdened with debts, destitute of necessaries, surrounded by indigent families, or driven into other employments for bread? How can they but suspect that their hearers are deceiving themselves, in professing to love Christ and the Gospel, while they enjoy plenty, and lay up for their children, and leave their pastor to wear out his life in poverty? Ministers have passions and feelings like other men; they find as much inward and outward opposition to the exercise of faith, and hope, and patience, as their brethren, and commonly more: so that their spirits are often depressed, and their hands weakened on these accounts, when a regard to the real dignity of their office forbids them to complain, and induces them to suffer in silence and submission. On the other hand, it behooves ministers to be as disinterested as possible: they had better suffer all things, and even lose their lives, than give reason to suspect that they act from love to filthy lucre, or that any should make their glorying void, when they avow that the love of Christ, and of souls, dictates their affectionate persuasions and solemn warnings. But if they, to whom a dispensation is given to preach the Gospel, and who act according to it, have no ground of glorying, because necessity is laid upon them, and wo is to them if they do not; what will be the case of those who willingly assume this office, and seek a designation to it, and then bestow no pains to preach the Gospel, or to preach at all, but only aim to appropriate as much as possible of those funds, that were established for the maintenance of such as labour in the word and doctrine? Wo! wo! to such idol-shepherds, to such hireling priests! yea, to all who encourage and reward their unfaithfulness! But in proportion as we honestly lay ourselves out in this good work, and willingly embrace opportunities of preaching the Gospel without charge, when they offer themselves; and give up our right, lest we should abuse our power in the Gospel, we shall be assured, that we act from genuine principles, and shall have a gracious reward: for "when "the chief Shepherd shall appear, we shall receive a "crown of glory that fadeth not away."

V. 19—27.

Whilst we refuse to flatter the person or palliate the vices of any man, or to deviate from truth and duty to gain favour or applause, we should be ready to give up our own interest, humour, credit, or inclinations, and to be servants to all men, that we may gain the more. A mind freed from narrow bigotry, enlarged by comprehensive views of the grand object of the Gospel, and taught to keep the great end of doing good continually in view, will know when to waive minute discussions, to connive at less dangerous prejudices; and to venture down towards the ground of other men, in order to argue with them upon their own principles, and to bring them to saving views of the Gospel. But while a man postpones or subordinates every other thing to this grand object, as far as consists with important truth and duty; while he becomes all things to all men, that he may gain the more to share with him in the great blessings of salvation, and to be useful to persons of different sentiments and descriptions; and while, on the other hand, he will not give place for a moment, where essential truth or the salvation of souls is at stake; he must expect to be deemed a time-server by bigots, inconsistent by the ignorant, a bigot by the unprincipled; and unsound, weak, or unfaithful, by the self-conceited. Indeed, we should always watch against extremes. If we have to do with those who are superstitious or self-righteous, while we insist on the necessity of good works, and connive at their mere external forms; we must be very careful to warn them against relying on such things, and in leading them to trust in Christ alone. If we have to do with those, who seem to be without law, and would endeavour to show them, that true religion requires of us no injurious or useless observances, we must still remember, that we are not “without law to God, but under the law to Christ;” and we must not countenance or connive at their loose principles or practices: and, in condescending to the weak and injudicious, we must not tolerate those errors or faults, which may either injure them, or disgrace the Gospel. But a simple heart, a single eye, and an habitual reliance on God for heavenly wisdom, will carry a man through such services, and past such dangers, as cannot be directed or guarded against by any rules. If, however, we would be deemed in earnest in seeking the salvation of other men, we must not be remiss in securing our own. We must run the race vigorously, if we would have them so to “run that they may obtain.” We must endeavour to practise our own exhortations: in striving for the mastery, we must be temperate in all things; and in fighting the good fight, we must contend as those who know they are opposed by real and formidable enemies. Thus subduing our sinful passions, habituating every inclination to submit, “keeping our bodies under, and bringing them into subjection,” we shall best enjoy the assurance, that when we have “preached to others we shall not ourselves be cast-aways;” for this, though tremendous, it is to be feared is not at all uncommon. And when we consider what labour, self-denial, self-abasement, and perseverance, men submit to, for the fading honours and corruptible interests of this world, it should make us ashamed of shrinking from any hardship, abstinence, self-abasement, or suffering, that may be needful in securing the incorruptible crown, for which we are called to contend.

NOTES.

CHAP. X. V. 1—5. In prosecuting his subject concerning things offered to idols, the apostle next referred the Corinthians to the case of Israel, and the judgments of God which came upon them for their carnal self-indulgence. He would not have them ignorant, how that all the fathers of the Jewish nation came out of Egypt under the guidance and protection of the cloud, which gave them light by night, and was an overshadowing canopy to them by day; being an emblem of the Lord's providential care and gracious guidance of his people: and that the whole nation was safely conducted through the red sea, in which the Egyptians were drowned. Thus they were initiated, as by baptism, into the true religion, under the instruction of Moses, the type of Christ, by the over-shadowing cloud, and by the waters of the sea. Thus the whole nation, men, women, and children, were acknowledged as the visible Church of God, even as all professed Christians were admitted into the Church by baptism. (Notes, Ex. xiii. 21, 22. xiv. xv.) They all likewise, without exception, were sustained by the manna, which miraculous provision might be called spiritual meat, as it typified Christ, the Bread of life to the souls of the true Israel: and they all drank of those waters, which flowed from the rock, and which followed them as a river, through most of their wanderings in the wilderness. This too might be called spiritual drink, for it typified the sacred influences of the Holy Spirit, as given to believers through Jesus Christ: and the rock itself might be called spiritual; because that Rock was Christ, a type of him who was wounded and smitten for our sins, that salvation might be communicated to our perishing souls. (Notes, Ex. xvi. xvii.) Nothing can more clearly show the absurdity of forcing figurative language into a literal meaning, and so grounding doctrines upon it, as the Papists have done in the monstrous notion of transubstantiation, than this text. By such a mode of construction we might prove, that the rock was literally the person of Christ, and that the rock followed the Israelites in the wilderness! (Marg. Ref.) The Israelites, in respect of these things, seemed all alike the people of God, and dear to him: yet was he far from being well pleased with the most of them; so that they were destroyed in the wilderness in such multitudes, that their dead bodies lay in heaps upon the ground, as after the carnage of some terrible battle. Our fathers. (1.) The ancestors of the Jewish nation. The same, &c., (4.) ‘In fact, the sacraments of the ancients were the same as ours, as they had respect to Christ alone.’ (Beza.) Some make their sacraments types of our sacraments, that is, shadows of shadows: but a sacrament is well defined by our Church, to be ‘an outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace.’ It is not, however, obvious, that the word same refers in either sense to the Christian sacraments; though the apostle evidently intended to warn the Corinthians, not to presume on their baptism, or attendance on the Lord's supper, or any external forms, professions, or privileges, as securing to them the favour of God, notwithstanding their sins: and nothing could be better suited to his purpose, than the example of Israel.

V. 6—12. The apostle, in applying his subject, next observed, that these events were intended to be instructive examples to the Christian Church, or figurative representations of God's dealings with his professed worshippers in all ages: that by the fatal consequences of Israel's disobedience and rebellion, others might be deterred from allowing an evil concupiscence after sinful or inexpedient indulgences. (Notes, Num. xi. Ps. lxxviii. cvi.) The apostle, therefore, warned the Corinthians to "flee from "idolatry," of which they were in great danger; because they loved the luxurious gratification of their appetites and the pleasures of a feast, whatever other reasons they assigned for their conduct. (Notes, Ex. xxxii.) Some expositors suppose that the word rendered to play, signifies to commit fornication: but the Israelites are not, on that occasion, charged with this crime, or others of the same nature: and a jovial festive religion, without gross and scandalous immorality, is peculiarly congenial to human nature, as circumstanced in this world; in which regard to character and worldly interest, and some remaining feeling in the conscience, restrain vast numbers of unconverted persons from direct licentiousness, especially where the word of God is so far known, as to render those crimes shameful, and uneasy to the conscience, which the Gentiles practised without shame or remorse. In the next verse the apostle warns the Corinthians against fornication, (to which the inhabitants of Corinth were so addicted, that one Greek word, signifying to commit fornication, is taken from the name of that city, to follow the custom of Corinth:) and he adduces the example of Israel, when, by the counsel of Balaam, the daughters of Moab were their tempters, and their fornication was connected with the worship of Baal-peor. Twenty-three thousand died of the plague, besides one thousand slain by the sword, at the command of Moses. (Notes, Num. xxv. Marg. Ref.) He then cautions them against tempting Christ, by provoking him to jealousy, wearying out his patience, and putting his love and power to the proof, as the Israelites had done in the wilderness, when he was with them as JEHOVAH of Hosts, their Redeemer: and from murmuring ungratefully at the Lord's dispensations towards them, the restrictions laid on them, or the spiritual authority exercised over them, as the Israelites had done; and for which they had been cut off by desolating judgments, and the destroying angel, whom the Lord employed against them. (Notes, Num. xiii. xiv. xvi. xvii. xx. xxi.) These transactions have before been fully considered; and the application of them to the conduct of the Corinthians must be obvious to every attentive reader. The apostle therefore further assured them, that those things which seemed so severe in respect of Israel were merciful in the object; being intended as examples to others, warning them to restrain their appetites and passions, and to exercise holy caution and humble fear. Especially they were written for the admonition of Christians, on whom the completion of the ages was come: who had the Substance of all their shadows and the accomplishment of all their prophecies; who enjoyed those advantages, which were the end and perfection of the old dispensation; and who lived under the light of the last and most complete revelation, which was to be vouchsafed to the world. For, in proportion to their light, privileges, and encouragements, so ought their holy obedience to be: their guilt would otherwise be more aggravated than under the darker dispensation of the law; and would be punished with more terrible judgments. It therefore was proper that every man, who supposed himself to stand secure of God's favour, and strong in the faith of the Gospel, without being troubled by weak and superstitious scruples, should take heed that he did not fall away from his self-confident profession, and at last lie under the righteous condemnation of God, having only "the form of god-"liness:" or lest, being a real Christian, he should, (like Peter, when through self-confidence he neglected to watch and pray,) fall into grievous sin, and thus wound his conscience, expose himself to severe rebukes, disgrace his profession, and injure or ruin the souls of others. Many writers suppose that an evil angel is meant by "the de-"stroyer," but this is not probable; for holy angels are continually represented as employed by the Lord, in executing vengeance on his enemies. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 13, 14. The Corinthians would be the more inexcusable, should they, through self-confidence and unwatchfulness, fall into sin; because no temptation had befallen them, but such as men in general must meet with from their own hearts, the suggestions of Satan, and the allurements of the world. They had not been tried by severe persecutions to deny Christ, or conform to the customary idolatry, as many had been, and would be. The apostle, however, did not mean to discourage the humble and fearful, by thus mentioning much stronger temptations than those which they had met with: for, if indeed they truly believed, the faithfulness of God to his promise and covenant would secure them from being finally overcome by any temptation. He would so direct and overrule every event, and restrain the malice of tempters and persecutors, as well as communicate strength proportioned to their trials, that they should never be tempted above what they were able; but, in some way or other, he would, in his providence, or by his grace, make a way for them to escape, that they should be enabled to bear the trial, and come forth out of it unhurt, however sharp or durable it might be. This cannot mean, that all believers should be rendered victorious over every particular temptation; because in that case they must all be kept from actual sin, which is contrary to fact and Scripture: yet it must imply, that no concurrence of circumstances should ever cast them into such temptation, as would render the commission of sin unavoidable; and that nothing should ever occasion their final apostacy and condemnation. (Rom. viii. 33—39.) However, the examples and warnings, which had been given, sufficiently proved that they ought to flee to the greatest distance from all approaches to, and occasions of, idolatry; for if so small a temptation as a feast was more than they could resist, how could they hope to withstand in the evil day of fiery persecution? The word rendered "a way to escape," is suited to lead the reader's thoughts to the case of a poor shipwrecked mariner, who has indeed escaped to dry ground; but the winds roar, the billows rage, the tide flows, the cliffs overhang, and death, inevitable death, seems still to pursue him, when at length he discovers an opening, or gate, (such as are common in some places where the cliff is high and steep,) and thus a most welcome outlet, or way of escape, is unexpectedly afforded him! The experience of some Christians, who have been peculiarly tried and tempted, till ready to give up hope, and yet at length rescued and filled with admiring gratitude, will show the peculiar propriety of the illustration. (Heb. xiii. 7. Gr.) A metaphor, taken from them who, 'being surrounded by thieves, are in danger on every 'side.' (Pareus in Leigh.)

V. 15—17. The Corinthians valued themselves on their superior knowledge and wisdom; and the apostle would speak to them as wise men, and call on them, impartially and discreetly to judge of what he had further to adduce against their feasting in the idol temples. Would they not allow that the cup of wine, which was used in the Lord's supper to represent spiritual blessings, and as an act of praise and thanksgiving to God, after it had been blessed and set apart by prayer for that purpose, was a token and pledge of their communion in the blood of Christ as the atonement for sin, and their being made joint partakers of it? And was not the bread which they broke a token of their participating of his body? Did not a man's joining in that ordinance imply a profession of faith in Christ crucified, and of adoring gratitude to him for this salvation? Certainly every one would put this construction on it: and if a man really intended in his heart what he thus professed, he would actually have the communion of the Saviour's blood shed and body broken for the sins of the world. For all Christians, by this ordinance and the faith in it professed, and the grace implied, were united, as the grains of wheat in one loaf of bread, or as the members in the human body; seeing they were all united to Christ, and had fellowship with him and one another, by partaking of the same bread, as a token of their feeding by faith on the same spiritual nourishment for their souls. In like manner, to join with idolaters in their feasts, at the temples of their idols, must be understood, as a professed act of communion with the idol and its worshippers: and if this was not intended, it was a sort of hypocritical profession. 'The apostle calls it "the cup of blessing," 'because, when we have it in our 'hand, we praise and bless, with admiration of his in'effable gift, him who shed his blood for us; and not only 'shed his blood, but has made us all partakers of it.' (Ambrose.) 'These words, the loaf or bread, is one, and 'we all partake of one loaf, and therefore are one body, 'show how grossly the Church of Rome has varied from 'Christ's institution, in distributing to the communicants 'severally an unbroken wafer; so that they are neither 'partakers of one loaf, or bread, or of bread broken.' (Whitby.)

V. 18—22. The subject might be illustrated by the case of "Israel after the flesh," the nation of Israel, as distinguished from the whole company of believers. They who feasted in the courts of the temple, upon the flesh of the sacrifices and peace-offerings, of which part had been burned upon the altar, were understood to have fellowship with JEHOVAH and his worshippers, and to expect a share of the benefits arising from such sacrifices; and was not the meaning similar, when any one feasted with idolaters in their idol-temples, upon their sacrifices? Would they then suppose him to mean, that an idol was a real being, to whom worship was rendered? Or that these sacrifices differed materially from other food? Thus he knew that some of them would speculate to excuse their self-indulgence. But, though the deities to which they sacrificed were non-entities, and all the account of their origin and exploits mere fables, yet he must inform them that their sacrifices were actually presented to devils, fallen angels, malignant demons, and that these ambitious rivals of God were gratified by them, in proportion as God was dishonoured and provoked. Perhaps some might fancy that the name was not essential, and that God was worshipped in these rites, though under another title: (as modern speculators have asserted that JEHOVAH, and Jove, or Jupiter, &c. are virtually the same; and that the supreme Being is worshipped with equal acceptance in every age and clime;) but the apostle assured them, that these sacrifices were not presented to God, but to the determined enemies of God and man; and he would not on any account have his beloved Corinthians join themselves with devils and their worshippers. Indeed, they could not make the ordinances of Christ to consist with these abominable rites; and if they attempted it, they would provoke the Lord to jealousy by this familiarity with his detested rivals, as if they were stronger than he, and could defend themselves against his judgments; even as a woman, though not guilty of gross adultery, must excite the suspicion and indignation of her husband, if she associated very familiarly with the man of whom he entertained a peculiar jealousy. (Marg. Ref.) The apostle joined himself in these inquiries, to show how greatly he abhorred such a conduct, and how he should dread the consequences of being seduced into it. 'Dare you then, being espoused 'to Christ, provoke the Lord to jealousy by idolatry, 'which is spiritual whoredom? "Are you stronger than "he," 'and able to resist him, when he shall let loose 'his fury against you?" (Locke.)

V. 23—28. (Notes, vi. 12, 13. viii.) The feasting in the idol-temples having been shown to be direct idolatry, the apostle next proceeded to prove, that some limitations must be assigned to their liberty; and expediency and edification consulted in the use even of lawful things. He exhorted them, therefore, not to seek their own indulgence or satisfaction, exclusively or principally, but to study the welfare and advantage of their brethren and neighbours, whom they ought to love as themselves, and for whose greater good they ought to give up every inferior interest. He would, however, allow them to eat without scruple, what they bought in the public market, without asking any questions, whether it had been offered to an idol or not; lest they should receive an answer, which might tend to perplex or wound the consciences of their brethren, if their own were out of danger: for, as the earth and its fulness belonged to the Lord, they might partake of his bounty without hesitation, if they knew no reason to the contrary. In like manner, if an unbelieving friend or relation invited them to his house, and they were disposed to go; (which in many cases would be lawful, and in some even expedient;) let them eat of the provisions set before them, without asking any questions. But if any one informed them that this or the other dish was part of an idol sacrifice, let them refrain from eating of it; because it would be proper thus to protest against idolatry, and to show their judgment of it, for the benefit especially of him who told them, whether he were a Christian or an unbeliever, and that they might not wound the conscience of any man. And as the earth and its fulness were the Lord's, they could not need such defiled food, but might be supplied with other meat, though they abstained from it. Some versions and manuscripts omit the concluding clause; but there appears to me a peculiar beauty in the repetition, and entirely in the apostle's manner. All things are lawful, &c. (23.) 'Tertullian, 'speaking of women's apparel, says, 'How much more 'easily will she fear things unlawful, who is cautious and 'scrupulous in things lawful!' 'Thus Clement also, 'They who do whatever is lawful will soon glide into 'that which is unlawful.' (Beza.)

V. 29—33. The apostle observed, perhaps with reference to the self-confidence of some at Corinth, that he did not so much mean they were to abstain for the sake of their own consciences; for he supposed them able to discard such ignorant scruples: but for the sake of other men's consciences, especially those of their weaker brethren. Yet they would inquire, why their liberty was to be thus censured and restrained, out of regard to other men's consciences? Or why they were to be blamed and slandered, in eating those things, for which they gave thanks, and which they received in a thankful and believing frame of mind? Thus we may explain the passage as the objection of the Corinthians to the apostle's directions: but it may be understood as his inquiry, Why they should so incautiously use their liberty, as to give cause for its being condemned in the consciences of other men? Or why they should so use those good gifts of God, which they received with grace and thanksgiving, as to give cause for slander or offence? He therefore concluded this subject by admonishing them, whether they ate or drank, in any place or company, or whatever they did, to do it all with an habitual aim at the glory of God: by considering his precepts, and the propriety, expediency, appearance, or tendency of their actions, and the construction which others would put upon them: and by acting with prudence, temperance, thankfulness, consistency, and charity in every thing. Thus the whole tenour of their conduct would show the excellency of the Gospel, and conduce to win over others to it; by which the name and perfections of God would be the more known, adored, and glorified. This great end they ought habitually to have in view: whatever interfered with it ought to be avoided; and every interest, pursuit, and indulgence, should be rendered subordinate, or even, if possible, subservient to it. They would then be careful to give no needless offence to any man, or to throw any stumbling-block in the way, either of Jews or Gentiles; and not to give cause of sin to the Church, or any believer: but to follow the apostle as he followed Christ, (xi. 1.) according to what he had shown them of his principles and conduct; (Notes, &c. ix.) in which he had endeavoured to please men of all descriptions, and in all things, as far as consisted with faithfulness; in nothing consulting his own emolument or satisfaction, but the good of many, in order to promote their salvation. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—5.

The mistakes and sins of professed Christians commonly originate from ignorance of the Scriptures, or from a partial attention to them. If this were not common, men could not suppose, that forms, ordinances, or assent to doctrines, would procure them a license to indulge their passions, or impunity in the allowed practice of sin. Men may seem to be converted; they may relate a specious experience, and make a credible profession of faith; they may be admitted members of the visible church, where the strictest discipline is exercised, and statedly hear the most faithful instruction; they may be greatly distinguished by external privileges and gifts; they may be baptized in any form, and receive the spiritual meat and drink of the Lord's supper, in the purest societies; and yet, not 'feeding on Christ himself in their hearts by faith,' God will not be well pleased with them, but they will die short of Canaan, and perish with the multitude of the ungodly.

V. 6—14.

The examples recorded in the word of God for our admonition, who in these latter ages of the world enjoy the full benefit of all preceding revelations, should warn us to repress every evil lusting; to avoid a festive, sensual religion, which gratifies the eye, the ear, the taste, and which connects with sitting down to eat and drink, and rising up to play; to keep at a distance from every forbidden indulgence; and not to tempt Christ, by running ourselves into those dangers in which many have perished; and to avoid all murmurings and disputings, by which the enemy of souls hath made such havock in the church. Above all, we should beware of "a haughty spirit, which "goes before a fall;" and while we think we stand, we should trust in God to preserve us from deceiving ourselves, and from falling by temptation, using every means of security against such fatal and lamentable evils. In these quiet times we have no temptation to resist, but such as is common to man; and if we cannot now stand our ground against the world, the flesh, and the devil, what should we do in the fiery trial of persecution? If we are not prepared to give up a worthless interest or indulgence for Christ's sake, how should we yield our bodies to the flames in his cause? Whether, however, the world smiles or frowns, it is a dangerous enemy; but if we are believers, we shall be enabled to overcome it, with all its terrors and fascinations; nor will our faithful covenant-keeping God suffer us to be tempted above what we are able. We may often be alarmed, harassed, baffled, and even cast down; but we shall rise again superior to our foes; for with every temptation the Lord will be sure to make some "way for us to escape, that we may be able to bear it." Yet his fear put into our hearts will be one great means of our safety; and the greater our humble jealousy is concerning ourselves, the more we shall escape such falls, as, when not fatal, are productive of very painful consequences. We should therefore flee from temptation, and not ostentatiously parley with it.

V. 15—22.

If we would be deemed wise, let us show our wisdom by a circumspect conduct, and not by curious speculations.—Our union and communion with Christ and his people, by partaking of his ordinances, should engage us to avoid

CHAP. XI.

The apostle exhorts the Corinthians to imitate him, as he imitated Christ, 1. He praises them for observing his injunctions, 2. He gives directions concerning men and women prophesying, 3—16. He blames them for abuses in their religious assemblies; especially for their divisions, 17—19; and their profanation of the Lord's supper, 20—22; reminding them of the first institution of it; and showing the danger of partaking of it unworthily, 23—34.

BE [a] ye followers of me, [b] even as I also am of Christ.

2 Now [c] I praise you, brethren, [d] that ye remember me in all things, [e] and keep the * ordinances, as I delivered them to you.

3 But I would have you know, that [f] the Head of every man is Christ; [g] and the head of the woman is the man; [h] and the Head of Christ is God.

4 Every man praying [i] or prophesying, [k] having his head covered, dishonoureth his head.

5 But every woman that prayeth [l] or prophesieth with her head uncovered, dishonoureth her head: for that is even all one as if she were [m] shaven.

6 For if the woman be not covered, let her also be shorn: [n] but if it be a shame for a woman to be shorn or shaven, let her be covered.

7 For a man indeed ought not to cover his head, forasmuch as [o] he is the image and glory of God: [p] but the woman is the glory of the man.

8 For [q] the man is not of the woman; but the woman of the man.

9 Neither was [r] the man created for the woman; but the woman for the man.

all "fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness," and all conformity to the vanities of the world. When we receive the outward signs of the body and blood of Christ, we should seriously inquire into the sincerity of this profession of faith in him and his atonement, and of our desire to live devoted to his service, and united to his people, as one bread, and one body, with him and them. For "the world lieth in the wicked one;" ungodly men are the servants of the devil, and false religion is his worship, however ingeniously some may varnish over or deny this awful truth: we cannot unite the service of God with that of devils, or have fellowship with Christ and with those enemies whose works he was manifested to destroy; and they who aim at such a coalition are commonly hypocrites in their religion, and only sincere in their idolatrous worship of mammon. If Christians will venture into those places, and join in those sacrifices to "the lust "of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life," which are of no ill repute even in this land, they will certainly provoke the Lord to jealousy; and seeing they cannot endure his omnipotent indignation, why should they foolishly act as if they were stronger than he?

V. 23—33.

* * *

Let us not be abused with vain words about the innocence of this or the other worldly pleasure; these apologies are seldom grounded in truth; but if they were, Are such indulgences expedient? Do they tend to edification? Do they consist with charity? Might not the time and money be better employed? Does not the example grieve or mislead others? Let us not then be so selfish as to seek our own needless indulgence, in preference to the important good of our neighbours. While we trust in the Lord for our temporal provision, and thankfully receive it as his gift, let us be careful to use our liberty or plenty in such a manner, that we may "avoid the appearance of evil," of excess or selfishness, and of whatever may occasion censure or suspicion, and that piety, charity, temperance, and prudence, may so regulate even our feasts and meals, and every part of our conduct, that "whether we eat or drink, "or whatever we do, we may do all to the glory of God." Connected with this great end, we should be careful to give no needless offence to, or occasion any prejudice in, the minds of unbelievers of any description, and not to cause any discord in the church, or disquietude to the consciences even of weak believers; but we should endeavour in all things to please others rather than ourselves, as far as it consists with our duty, or can conduce to their profit and salvation. And let us remember, that he who gives us these admonitions, and calls us to follow him as he followed Christ, was the writer of those scriptures which most fully declare the doctrines of free grace and of God's eternal purposes, which therefore must consist with these practical instructions, though many are unable to perceive that consistency.

NOTES.

CHAP. XI. V. 1. This verse, most evidently, is connected with the conclusion of the preceding chapter; it referred to what the apostle had written concerning his own conduct in the ninth chapter, and it concluded the subject which began in the eighth. He called on the Corinthians to be imitators of his example, (even as he imitated Christ,) especially in the charitable and cautious use of their christian liberty, (Note, Rom. xv. 1—3.) and he thus hinted, that they had in this respect followed others who had acted contrary to the will and the example of Christ.

10 For this cause ought the woman to have * power on her head [s] because of the angels.

11 Nevertheless, [t] neither is the man without the woman, neither the woman without the man, in the Lord.

12 For as the woman is of the man, even so is the man also by the woman; [u] but all things of God.

13 [x] Judge in yourselves: is it comely that a woman pray unto God uncovered?

14 Doth not even nature itself teach you, that [y] if a man have long hair, [z] it is a shame unto him?

15 But if a woman have long hair, it is a glory to her: for her hair is given her for † a covering.

16 But if any man [a] seem to be contentious, we have no [b] such custom, neither [c] the churches of God.

V. 2—16. The apostle here entered on another subject, and began to discuss several particulars respecting the public assemblies of the Corinthians; which, with some digressions, he continued to the end of the fourteenth chapter. As he was about to reprove various abuses, he deemed it adviseable to begin by a general commendation of their conduct, in remembering him and observing his injunctions, though this admitted of some exceptions, or misconstructions had taken place, and it would therefore be proper to show them his meaning in these things. In the abundance of spiritual gifts bestowed on the Corinthians, several women had been endued with the Spirit of prophecy, which enabled them, by immediate inspiration, to offer prayers for the congregation, or to give instructions, or even to predict future events; for it is not reasonable to suppose, that a woman could be said to prophesy, merely by being present when another prophesied. This seems to have been the only case in which women were allowed to speak in public, and in this respect some abuses had crept in. (xiv. 34, 35. 1 Tim. ii. 11—13.) In order to understand what was becoming in this exempt case, the apostle would have them to understand, that Christ was the immediate Head, or Ruler, of every man among them; whose honour was concerned in their conduct; and that the man was the immediate head and ruler of the woman, to whose authority God had subjected her, and who would therefore be disgraced by any impropriety in her behaviour; and that Christ, as Mediator, was subject to God as his Head and Principal, to whose glory his whole conduct in his mediatorial government was referred. As therefore Christ did the will, and sought the honour, of God, so the Christian should avow his subjection to Christ doing his will and seeking his glory, and the woman should acknowledge her subjection to the man, and, (in all things lawful,) do what was pleasing and honourable to him.—According to the custom of those days, a veil on the head was the token of subjection and respect to superiors; if a man therefore should pray or prophesy with such a covering, he would dishonour Christ his Head, by acting out of character, and appearing as if he was placed in subjection to the woman, instead of in authority over her. On the other hand, it would be inconsistent with modesty, and her state of subjection, for a woman to lay aside her veil on such occasions; for thus she would seem to forget her place, and to affect authority, which would dishonour the man whom God had appointed to be as a head over her. Nay, this would be so great an impropriety, that it would be of a similar meaning with the shaving of her head, which was a disgraceful punishment, that was used to be inflicted on women of bad character. If then the women would exercise their gifts uncovered, let them be shorn or shaven; but if they deemed this shameful, let them wear their veils. Some think that these prophetesses had their hair dishevelled after the manner of the Pythian priestesses of Apollo; and if this was so, it would be an additional reason for the apostle thus strenuously to oppose them. The man, indeed, being the image and glory of God, and appointed as his representative in ruling over this lower world, ought not to be veiled on these occasions. But the woman, reflecting, as it were, the man's glory, being formed his counterpart, and the most honourable subject of his delegated authority, ought to avow her willing subjection by wearing the veil. For the woman was not originally created separately, but taken out of the man as a part of him, yet inferior to him; neither was the man created for the woman's advantage, but the woman for that of the man. (Notes, &c. Gen. ii. 20—25.) On this account therefore the woman ought to be covered with her veil, even when praying or prophesying, as an emblem of her being under the authority of the man. Many conjectures have been formed concerning the meaning of the following expression, "because of the angels;" but probably the apostle referred to the presence of holy angels, (who had witnessed the creation of man,) as spectators, or even in some respects as joint worshippers with believers in their public assemblies, which therefore ought to be regulated with the most exact propriety, that these heavenly worshippers might not witness any thing unbecoming so holy an occasion. But though the woman had been created for and subjected to the man, yet no difference was made between them in respect of their acceptance in Christ, but they were called together to have fellowship with him. Nor ought the authority of the man to be exercised harshly, but in tenderness and love, seeing that, as the woman was originally "from the man," so the man hath ever since been "by the woman," born of her, and tended on in infancy by her tender care; that as both were reciprocally means of comfort and benefit to each other, so they should live together in harmony and affection. But all things were to be considered as derived from God, and regulated by him, whose wise appointments ought to be submitted to. The Corinthians therefore might judge for themselves, whether, according to the constitution of the Creator, it would be comely for a woman to appear uncovered in the act of worshipping him. Even nature would teach them, that if a man wore his hair long, and tired in the manner which custom had appropriated to women, it would be a disgrace to him, 17 ¶ Now in this that I declare unto you, [d] I praise you not, [e] that ye come together not for the better, but for the worse.

18 For first of all, when ye come together in the church, [f] I hear that there be * divisions among you; and I partly believe it.

and be considered as a proof of effeminacy and folly. On the other hand, long hair, when decently tired according to the custom of the times, would be an honour to a woman, being given to her as a natural veil; and to wear her hair short, as men used to do, would appear masculine and disgraceful; and, for the same reason, she ought to wear her veil on her head when praying, that she might keep her proper place and appear in character. These things the apostle stated as decent and proper; but if any of the Corinthian teachers appeared inclinable to excite a contention about them, he would only add, that he and his brethren knew of no such custom as prevailed among them; nor was there any such in the Churches of God, that had been planted by the other apostles.

V. 17—22. Another exception the apostle must adduce to the general commendation that he had bestowed upon the Corinthians; as when they came together, they behaved so disorderly, that it tended to their detriment rather than their edification; and thus they lost more in one way than they gained in others, in respect of religious improvement. For, in the first place, when they assembled as a society met together for the worship of God, in which they ought to have been of one heart and mind, there were divisions, or schisms, among them. Though they met in one place, as one congregation, yet they were divided into parties, and were actuated by carnal competition and mutual animosity. This disgraceful report he had heard, and he believed it in part, or concerning a part of them; for he was so acquainted with human nature and the temper of the Corinthians, that he was aware these schisms would be followed by heresies also, or by a more entire separation of some of them from the rest, out of zeal for the pernicious doctrines which they had espoused. 'It seems evident from hence, that 'heresy is something worse than the schism abovementioned.' (Doddridge.) This Satan was attempting, and God would permit it to take place, in order to distinguish his approved servants by their steadfast adherence to the truth, from the unsound professors of Christianity, which had crept in among them. Their assembling together in one place with such divided hearts was very evil, and their subsequent conduct was so carnal, that though they professed to celebrate the Lord's supper, they could not be said to do this, but rather to substitute a carnal feast in the stead of it. For they brought their own provisions with them, and ate them separately, not waiting for each other, or communicating with each other! So that a selfish or intemperate meal had succeeded to that holy feast of faith and love! and, while the poor went away hungry for want of proper provisions, the rich ate and drank plentifully, if not to excess! What could be said to such a scandalous profanation? Had they not houses to feast in on their abundance, and to which they might invite their friends? Did they despise the assembled Church of God, as if it had been a company of intemperate revellers? Or did the rich purpose to shame their poor brethren, because they had not suitable provisions? Would they have him applaud such profane, uncharitable, and sensual practices? This he would not do, though glad to praise them when he could. Such a refusal of commendation implied the severest rebuke. It is almost unaccountable that a Christian Church, in a short time after this eminent apostle had left them, should run into so abominable a profanation of this sacred ordinance. But the public feasts of the Greeks were commonly conducted in this manner, which appears to us as inconsistent with civility as with piety. The self-conceited Corinthian teachers carried their notions of Christian liberty to an excess almost inconceivable at present; they not only joined in the idolatrous feasts of their neighbours, but they introduced the customs of them into the Church, and so perverted this sacred institution; and, to show the folly of man's wisdom, they were left thus to disgrace themselves more than other Churches, because they thought themselves wiser than they. It is also wonderful that the apostle should express so favourable an opinion of the Corinthians in general, notwithstanding these gross abuses; and we should thence learn caution in condemning whole religious societies, because of such evils as perhaps but few approve of, though numbers are seduced to connive at them. 'Μευειν, to be drunk, is by the gram-'marians thought to have its original from μετα το θυειν, '(after sacrificing,) because of the free drinking they 'indulged in after their sacrifices. The Judaizing con-'verts thought themselves obliged to drink plentifully at 'their festivals; four large cups of wine, saith Dr. Light-'foot, at the paschal supper, and to be quite drunk, saith 'Buxtorf, at the feast of Purim.' (Whitby.) If such sentiments were publicly avowed at the time when the apostle wrote, our astonishment at the facts advanced may be abated, but our abhorrence should be proportionably increased. 'Though the Corinthians had written to St. 'Paul, requesting his directions in several points, yet 'they had not said one syllable, about the enormities 'which had crept in amongst them, and in the blame of

V. 23—28. (Notes, Matt. xxvi. 26—29.) To remedy the disorders which prevailed among the Corinthians, the apostle referred them to the original appointment of the Lord's supper, with which he had been made acquainted by immediate revelation from Christ, and which he had faithfully delivered to them. This account of that ordinance entirely coincides with that which has been considered, and fully confirms the interpretation given of it. It was of great importance, that it should be here repeated and enforced, that the obligation of the institution to the end of the world might be fully ascertained. It is here added, that as oft as they drank of the cup, they were to do it in remembrance of Christ, in order that the frequent recollection of his love, his sufferings, and their obligations to him, might have a proper effect upon their hearts and lives; for as often as they attended on this ordinance, they would "show forth the Lord's death," that is, profess their faith in it, and declare the end and efficacy of it, till he should come to judgment. The manner in which the quakers evade this decisive declaration, (by saying, till the time when Christ should come, by his spiritual illumination on their minds, to take them off from carnal ordinances,) is a striking instance of perverse ingenuity used in defence of rooted prejudices. The apostle here repeatedly speaks of the bread, after its consecration or appropriation to that particular use, which is decisive against those absurd and monstrous interpretations that have been put upon our Lord's words. He further declared, that whosoever should partake of this ordinance "unworthily," that is, in a profane, carnal, or irreverent manner, as an ordinary meal, or a sensual feast, or for secular purposes, would "be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord;" would be chargeable with treating them contemptuously; and, in a measure, with a share of their guilt, who wounded his sacred body and shed his precious blood upon the cross. It was therefore proper for every man, however approved by his pastor and brethren, to examine himself, concerning the reality of his faith and repentance, the sincerity of his profession, his intentions in communicating, the state of his heart, and the tenour of his conduct: not in order to find some reason for absenting himself, but that, after such self-examination and serious preparation of heart, he might commemorate the Lord's death in a proper manner, and according to his appointment. This expressly shows it to be every Christian's duty to attend on this ordinance, and that both the bread and the wine should be administered to all without exception. Indeed, in one place, (27,) it is in the original "shall eat this bread, or drink this cup, &c." and the needless variation in our version has caused some cavils of the papists, yet the verse would as readily prove, that the wine alone, as that the bread alone, should be received; but in fact it only shows that both bread and wine should be received in a serious, believing, and reverential manner. 'The true form of celebrating the Lord's 'supper must be sought from its first institution, of which 'these were the parts. The pastors must declare the death 'of the Lord by preaching his word; bless the bread and 'wine, having called on the name of God, and explained 'the institution along with their prayers; and, finally, 'deliver the broken bread to be eaten, and the cup to be 'taken and drunk, with thanksgivings. The flock must 'prove themselves, that is, carefully examine their know'ledge, faith, and repentance; they must "show forth "the death of Christ," that is, by true faith consent to 'his word and appointment; and, finally, receive the bread 'from the hand of the minister, and eat it, and drink the 'wine, and give thanks to the Lord. This was the liturgy 'of Paul and the apostles.' Show forth. 'That is, pub'licly profess that you believe and embrace it with 'thanksgiving.' (Beza.) From one loaf our Lord, having broken it, gave a portion to each person present, and they all drank from the same cup, as a token that all believers alike partake of the blessings signified in that sacred ordinance, and have communion with one another, as one in Christ. How different this from a number of people meeting together, to make a meal each separately from the provisions which they had brought with them! Much has been written by some expositors concerning the love-feasts, which are supposed to have accompanied the administration of the Lord's supper in the primitive times, as having given occasion to the disorders which the apostle here reproves; but it is not certain that he at all refers to them; and indeed it is not probable that they were at this time in use.

30 For this cause [c] many are weak and sickly among you, and many [d] sleep.

31 For [e] if we would judge ourselves, we should not be judged.

32 But when we are judged, [f] we are chastened of the Lord, that we should not be [g] condemned with the world.

33 Wherefore, my brethren, when ye come together to eat, tarry one for another.

34 And [h] if any man hunger, let him eat at home; that ye come not together unto * condemnation. And the rest [i] will I set in order [k] when I come.

V. 29—34. To show still further the necessity of self-examination, the apostle declared that every one, who unworthily partook of this ordinance, would "eat and "drink judgment to himself:" his very attendance on this religious service would offend God, and expose him to his righteous judgment, because he made no proper discrimination between the bread and wine, which represented the Lord's body, as offered on the cross to be a sacrifice for our sins to be received by faith, and an ordinary meal. This irreverence, being a heinous crime, would doubtless subject a man to final condemnation, if he did not repent; but it is evident the apostle did not mean, that it was in its own nature unpardonable, or sealed a man's damnation, as many have supposed; for he was addressing Christians, and warning them to beware of incurring those temporal judgments, with which God chastised his offending servants. The scruples and consequent negligence of numbers, who seem in other things to obey Christ, have no ground in this passage, except in the apparent harshness of our translation, in which the word that signifies judgment is rendered damnation, which commonly means eternal punishment. Indeed, the conscious unworthiness and lamented infirmities of those who desire to express their gratitude for redeeming love, are widely different from the profanations of these Corinthians, who yet were not at all supposed to have sinned beyond the hope of pardon; and generally they, who deem themselves most unworthy, are least likely to receive unworthily, which is commonly the sin of the proud and self-sufficient. But the apostle showed his meaning in what follows; for he observed, that, on account of these profanations, many of them were visited with enfeebling and wasting sickness, and several had even been cut off by death; which, being called sleep, was charitably supposed to be that of believers. For if men would call themselves to an account for their conduct, and humble themselves before God in deep repentance, they would escape many temporal calamities, as well as final condemnation; but when Christians were thus judged and visited 'with divers diseases and sundry kinds of 'death,' "they were chastened of the Lord, that," being thus led to repentance, "they might not be condemned "with the world." As this was the case, the apostle exhorted them to tarry for each other, and to commemorate the death of their Lord in charity and peace, as well as in faith and piety; and let them satisfy their hunger at home, and not think of making a full meal, or a sensual feast, of the Lord's supper, by which they exposed themselves to condemnation and very painful visitations, even when meeting together in the Saviour's name. As to the rest, he meant to come shortly, and then he would regulate matters by his apostolical authority. It is manifest that the custom, which some scrupulously adhere to as a matter of conscience, often to the injury of their health, of receiving the Lord's supper fasting, has not the smallest ground in scripture, and is in fact a mere superstition; as is the still vastly more common notion, that irreverence, or even involuntary defects and mistakes in this sacrament, are far more heinous and perilous than in other acts of worship, or even in administering or receiving baptism.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—16.

We should imitate no man, except as he follows Christ, whose example alone is absolutely perfect; nor should we desire that others should follow us, any further than we are enabled to copy our Lord and Master. When we must blame in some things, we should show a disposition to be pleased, by commending and excusing whatever will admit of it. In order to know our duty in various particulars, we should accurately study our relations to God, and to each other in society. His plan of government includes much subordination, and materially differs from those of many who are deemed wise in this world. The immediate government of mankind, especially of Christians, is vested in One who bears our nature, and who, as Mediator, acknowledges the Father as his Head: under this mediatorial authority, he hath appointed man to be the head of the woman, who immediately rules over her; that, as the image and glory of God, he may in this, and other instances of relative authority, shadow forth the glory and obligations of the divine government. But the Lord hath so arranged matters, both in the kingdom of providence and in that of grace, that the authority of the superior, and the subjection of the inferior, relations should conduce to the mutual help and benefit of all parties. Even nature and the common sense of mankind require that men and women should preserve a due distinction in their apparel, behaviour, and appearance, and the contrary to this is contemptible and odious. The particulars by which this distinction shall be expressed are greatly determined by custom; but, however fashions may vary, an effeminate man, and a masculine woman, will always be disgusting and shameful. The believer's conduct should be so regulated, that it may honour Christ his Head, for even his indiscretions and improprieties will in a measure disgrace his profession: in like manner, the conduct of women will either do credit to their husbands, and those who stand nearly related to them, or they will dishonour them. Much attention therefore to decorum is necessary; but especially in every thing relating to the worship of God, where nothing unseemly or improper for any one's state, rank, or character ought to be tolerated. And not only should our sense of the Lord's special presence influence our conduct in this matter; but even that of the holy angels, who in our assemblies must witness many things unworthy of the sacred service, and which should carefully be avoided.

V. 17—22.

Alas! how often do even the professors of the Gospel meet together for the worse instead of the better! Especially how frequently do animosities, and personal or party contentions divide religious societies and corrupt the apparently united worship! Indeed, in the present state of human nature, such schisms and heresies cannot altogether be avoided: but whilst we adore the wisdom of God, in over-ruling these evils for the manifestation of those who are approved by him; we must by no means palliate the guilt of such persons, as thus divide and distract the Church. The Lord, indeed, can take occasion from the most horrid profanations to establish the most beneficial regulations: but that display of his wisdom and goodness is far from excusing the criminals, or exempting them from punishment. We should rejoice, that we are under no temptation to pervert the Lord's supper to an intemperate revel; but we may seriously inquire, whether profanations, equally flagrant and expressive of contempt, are not common among us. How often do avarice, ambition, and extravagance send their infidel, impious, or profligate votaries, to qualify for preferment by this sacred ordinance! How often do custom and ostentation lead sinners of superior rank to exhibit their petty distinctions, even in attending on this humiliating institution! How often is it made the support of Pharisaical pride! Or the cloak with which hypocrites cover dishonesty or secret licentiousness! Shall we praise men for such things? Surely no! nay, we must strenuously protest against them.

V. 23—34.

They who understand what the apostles received from Christ and delivered to the Church, respecting the interesting season when this ordinance was appointed, even that very ordinance in which the Saviour was betrayed; and concerning the meaning, use, and benefit of it, will perceive that a penitent heart, a simple reliance on God's free mercy by faith in Christ, according to the new testament in his blood; a thankful recollection of his sufferings and of his love; a desire to show forth his death, to profess our obligations to him, and to give up ourselves to his service, in doing good to his people, and to all men for his sake, constitute the proper preparation for acceptably communicating. All who are able to come in this frame of mind, are bound in gratitude and by their professed subjection to Christ, to "show forth the Lord's death till "he come." Such persons are not likely to eat and drink unworthily, or to be "guilty of the body and blood of "Christ;" and their fears and scruples are commonly the effect of mistake: for every one is fit to come to this ordinance, who can pray for spiritual blessings in the name of Christ, without hypocrisy and in an acceptable manner. There should, however, be an habitual self-examination; and a more particular one at some times when we have opportunity: this will tend to convince the humble believer of the difference between his case, and that of profane, proud, and carnal communicants. The same method will tend to prevent other evils and mistakes, which might bring chastisements upon us. But the end of such self-examination should be renewed repentance, acceptance of Christ, and prayer for grace to enable us to "discern the Lord's body," and to attend on this ordinance, in a humble, spiritual, and grateful manner. In every respect we act most wisely for our present comfort, as well as for our future good, when we judge ourselves that we may not be judged. Our personal and family trials should remind us, that the Lord hath a controversy with us: but, as we are apt to be partial or dilatory in judging ourselves, we should count it a mercy to be chastened of the Lord, and not condemned with the world; and to suffer any thing, even unto death, by which we may escape the eternal damnation of the wicked. Yet it is prudent for us to act with such caution, piety, charity, seriousness, and temperance, that we may, as much as we can, avoid chastenings, which "for the present seem not "joyous, but grievous," though they "bring forth the "peaceable fruits of righteousness to them who are exer-"cised thereby."

NOTES.

CHAP. XII. V. 1--3. The Corinthians were favoured with a rich abundance of extraordinary gifts and powers, by the operation of the Holy Spirit; which they exercised principally in their public assemblies: and, as they were divided into parties, it seems that they vied with each other in the ostentatious display of these endowments. This gave rise to envyings, covetings, repinings, &c. which were equally opposite to piety and charity. To remedy these grievous evils, the apostle began his observations on the subject, by reminding them of what they had been a short time before. He would not have them ignorant of the origin and use of such gifts; for though they prided themselves upon their speculative knowledge, they were in great danger of remaining entirely without instruction in many practical matters. Yet they must know that they had, in general, been Gentiles, who were carried away by a blind attachment to their idols, even as they were led captive by their lusts, by their priests, and by Satan. These were dumb idols, (notwithstanding all that was boasted of their oracles,) and therefore they could not confer on their deluded votaries those gifts of tongues, and that utterance, which the converts to Christianity had now received, and which must be ascribed only to the sovereign grace of God. It was then proper for them to understand, that all such gifts were confined within the limits of the Christian Church; so that no man, whether Jew or Gentile, who blasphemed the name of Jesus, or treated him as a deceiver, deserving the death of the cross, spake by the Holy Spirit; but his pretended, or apparent, inspiration must be ascribed either to human imposture, or diabolical agency. On the other hand, no man could sincerely confess Jesus to be the Lord, the promised Messiah, the Son of God, according to his own declarations concerning himself, except he spake under the influence of the Holy Spirit. The knowledge and belief of his truth, and the boldness to profess it, must come from that blessed Agent; in this important sense, all true Christians had spiritual gifts, and none ought either to despise another, or to deem himself over-looked, if he were not favoured with such as were more coveted, but less valuable. Yet the subject rather leads us to suppose the apostle to mean, that this confession from the mouth, even of a nominal Christian, being made under the impulse of the Holy Spirit, (as wicked Balaam prophesied,) was a spiritual gift, which might benefit others, though it should prove of no use to the possessor. (Note, 1 John iv. 1—3.) 'Nor 'can they who confirm the doctrine of Christ by miracles 'be acted on by any other but the Holy Ghost; for no 'evil spirit would assist them to confirm a doctrine so op'posite to and destructive of their kingdom and designs.' (Whitby.) The expression, "say that Jesus is the Lord," more obviously signifies the profession of the true doctrine concerning Christ, than the exercise of saving faith in him, especially in a discourse concerning "spiritual "gifts," or, as some would render it, "spiritual men," or men possessing spiritual gifts, such as are afterwards enumerated, (8—10.) to qualify them for any public stations in the Church. (28.) Many have prophesied in his name, as well as preached and defended his truth, who were workers of iniquity; yet, as far as they avowed "that Jesus was the Lord," they spake by the Holy Spirit. (Note, 1 John iv. 1—3. Marg. Ref.)

V. 4—11. There was a great diversity in the spiritual gifts conferred on the Corinthians, and they valued some of them far more than others; yet they were all from the same divine Spirit, of whose operations they were but instruments and vehicles. There were also various different administrations, or offices, in which men ministered to the benefit of the Church, according to the work assigned and the talents intrusted to them; but they were all the servants of Christ, and were dependent on and accountable to the same Lord. In the effects which followed the exercise of their gifts, whether in miraculous cures, or in the conversion of sinners, the whole was produced by the power of the same God, who wrought all these changes on the bodies and souls of men, through his Son, and by his Spirit, for the glory of his own great name. But the manifestation of the power and glory of the Spirit, in these extraordinary operations, was not made for the credit of the man by whom he wrought, but for the advantage of the Church, and even of those without, that the person who possessed these gifts, or filled up any office in the Church, might profit others; for these things were entirely distinct from that gracious state of the heart, which disposes a man to improve his talents of every kind; and gifts were sometimes bestowed on merely nominal Christians. For the purpose of thus profiting others, the Holy Spirit conferred on one, "the word of wisdom;" by which may be intended such immediate discoveries of the grand scheme of salvation, attended with such powers of discoursing about it, as were suited to render other men "wise unto salvation." To another the same Spirit gave "the word of knowledge," by which might be intended an exact and extraordinary understanding of the Old Testament types and prophecies, and a capacity of explaining difficult subjects, of answering objections, of determining cases of conscience, or of speaking suitable words to different descriptions of persons. Another was endued with a remarkable degree of faith, which rendered him capable of engaging in very perilous services, for which persons of more exact knowledge might be less competent. This kind and degree of faith was distinct from that gracious faith which justifieth, and so might be considered as a spiritual gift bestowed on certain persons, to enable them to profit others. Some of them were endued with the gift of performing miraculous cures, others were enabled to work miracles of divers kinds. Some predicted future events, others had a supernatural talent of discerning spirits, of perceiving by what principles men were actuated, or of what services they were capable. Some could speak in various languages which they had not learned, and others could miraculously interpret them to the hearers, who understood them not. All these endowments the Holy Spirit freely bestowed, in that measure and diversity which he saw good, and conducive to the common advantage of the Church, so that no one had any ground of glorying over others, or of repining, as if he were forgotten in this distribution. This is a most clear and conclusive attestation to the Personality, Sovereignty, and Deity of the Holy Ghost. There is, indeed, much difficulty at present, in determining precisely what the apostle meant by each of the terms here used, which doubtless were readily understood at the time when the gifts spoken of were exercised, some by one, and some by another of them; but the sense which appeared most probable has been chosen, and great exactness on such a subject is not at all necessary. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 12—14. (Note, Rom. xii. 4, 5.) The apostle next illustrated the wisdom and goodness of the Holy Spirit, in his distribution of these gifts, by the similitude of the human body. This, though formed of many members, constitutes one harmonious whole, while every member has its proper use and capacity for the common benefit. Thus, Christ mystical, or his Church, as united to him, its glorious Head, was one great whole, consisting of many parts. As the thing signified by the baptism of water, all true Christians had been baptized into Christ's body, by the communication of his life-giving Spirit, whether they had been before Jews or Gentiles, slaves or free-men; and by deriving continual supplies of that same Spirit, in answer to their earnest desires and believing prayers, they drank more and more into the mind of Christ. Here the apostle doubtless alluded to the wine used in the Lord's supper. Therefore, as the body is one, and hath one common interest, though it consists of many members, so Christians should be considered as incorporated by faith in Christ, and the supply of his Spirit; but if they had all possessed the same gifts, they would have more resembled a detached member, or several of the same kind, than an organized body.

V. 15—26. From the preceding general illustration, the Corinthians might see the absurdity of their emulations, covetings, and murmurs; for, supposing there could be a distinct consciousness in each of the members of the human body, and the foot, dissatisfied with its lowly, laborious, and useful station, should covet the function and the powers of the hand, and complain that, as this was not granted, it could not be deemed a part of the body, or at all regarded in it, would not every one see that this would be false and frivolous? The same would be the case, if the ear should repine, because not placed in the office, and possessed of the powers of the eye. For if every part of the body were formed into an eye, where would be the important sense of hearing? Instead of such monstrous productions, God hath wisely and kindly placed the members, senses, and organs in the human body, as it pleased him; and unspeakably better than any self-conceited counsellor could have directed. Insomuch, that the idea, of every member coveting to be the most honoured part, is associated with that of the destruction of the body; which necessarily consists of many different members, so formed and placed as to become one regular whole. Thus, the eye could not contemptuously deny that it wanted the assistance of the hand: for without the power of executing, of which the hand is the instrument, even sight would be of small value. Nay, the head itself, the seat or source of sensation and reflection, wants the help of the feet to convey it about from place to place. This appears still more clearly, in respect of those parts which seem feeble, and yet are absolutely necessary to life, or to the well being of the whole; such as the various vessels, by which digestion, nutrition, and circulation are carried on, and by which nature throws off whatever is redundant or detrimental. So far, in fact, are the more honourable parts of the body from appropriating the whole of a man's regard, that the contrary often takes place; and those parts which we are accustomed to conceal as less honourable, are covered and decorated with the greatest care and expense. For those that are deemed most honourable do not want such decoration, being comely in themselves. And if any part of the body is wounded, diseased, or pained, all other parts sympathize with it and share the suffering; and on the other hand, they all seem to rejoice and share the pleasure of that member, which is in health and at ease, or which is employed in any honourable or beneficial service.

V. 27—31. The apostle here applies his similitude to the case illustrated. The Church was the mystical body of Christ, and believers were particular members of that body. In placing these members, God, of his sovereign wisdom, had constituted some in the first and most honourable office of apostles; to whom especially he had "given "the word of wisdom," for the instruction of mankind. Next to them he had placed others as prophets, who gave particular instructions by immediate inspiration, as by "the word of knowledge;" and after them he had stationed pastors and teachers, to superintend and instruct particular congregations, or to preach occasionally in other places. Besides the gifts and authority conferred on these persons, many Christians were endued with the power of working miracles, and of healing the sick; others were qualified to attend and be assistant to the apostles in their labours as evangelists, or, as some explain it, to help the pastors in the office of deacons, and in various other services. Some were qualified to preside over and manage the secular affairs of the Church as governors; or they were suitable persons to be left in authority by the apostles; when they were forced away from newly planted churches "that they might set in order such things as were wanting;" while others were best qualified, by speaking a variety of tongues, to attempt the conversion of those who had not yet heard the Gospel. But would it be proper that all Christians should be apostles, prophets, teachers, or evangelists? This evidently was not the case; and if it could be thus ordered, the Church would be like a body, that was all eye, all tongue, &c.; like an army, constituted wholly of general officers, or like a kingdom of all rulers. The Corinthians, indeed, coveted earnestly, or were emulous of the best gifts, or such as were deemed most splendid and honourable; but the apostle was about to show them a more excellent way, even that of love, (Notes, xiii.) which would influence them to be content with the gifts already conferred, and to be principally zealous in making a useful improvement of them. Our translation, indeed, renders the clause as an exhortation: but it may with equal exactness be translated, "Ye do covet earnestly," &c. and so imply a reprehension of the corrupt emulation of the Corinthians; and this certainly coincides far better with the argument of the apostle; for exhorting them to "covet "the best gifts," or those that were most valued, which the Holy Spirit distributed as he saw good, would have sanctioned that ambitious temper, which he evidently aimed to repress.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

Acute speculators are often most ignorant in practical matters; they who are most elated with the gifts bestowed on them, are commonly most forgetful of the Giver, and the proper use of them; and spiritual gifts have frequently been the support of spiritual pride. In order to prevent these evils, we should often recollect what we were by nature and practice. We have not indeed been carried after dumb idols; yet "we were by nature chil- "dren of wrath, even as others;" we have idolized worldly objects; and most of us have been actually the enemies of God by wicked works, after which we were carried, even as Satan, the world, and the flesh led us. If then we have any knowledge of the truth, or any ability to communicate that knowledge to others, let us give the whole glory to God. There have been many pretenders to inspiration or extraordinary illumination; but all such appearances must be counterfeit in those who refuse the Lord Jesus those honours which he claimed to himself. For what do such men, but call Jesus accursed! They may speak of him as a good Man or a Teacher; but whilst they reject his priesthood, and deny his Deity, his Oneness with the Father, what do they less than charge him with blasphemy and imposture, in evidently advancing claims to this equality, and with abetting idolatry, in teaching "all "men to honour him even as they honour the Father?" And do they not in effect justify the Jewish rulers for putting him to death, as an Anathema, for saying "I "am the Son of God?" Can such men speak by the Holy Spirit, or according to the language of inspiration? But if indeed we can from our hearts say, that "Jesus is the "Lord;" if we adore him with Thomas, saying, "My "Lord, and my God!" and if we as sinners trust and obey him as our divine Saviour, Teacher, and King, we may be sure that we profess this faith "by the Holy "Spirit;" though we cannot explain the manner in which he hath wrought this conviction, and though we be destitute of all other spiritual gifts. We do not now expect miraculous gifts; but the word of wisdom and of knowledge, and divers special endowments, by the same Spirit, according to our different services to the same Lord; and that we may be the instruments in those operations of the same "God, who worketh all in all," may yet be expected by us. Whatever station therefore be allotted us, and whatever abilities we possess for the duties of that station, we should remember, "that they were given us "to profit withal." Even a capacity to speak, in a proper and scriptural manner, on any topic of religion, will not profit any man, except he have grace, humbly and simply to improve his talent for the edification of others, without seeking his own glory. Such endowments will indeed infallibly expose the possessor to many additional temptations; and as he will need a larger measure of grace to keep him humble and spiritual, so he will probably meet with a more abundant share of painful experiences and humiliating dispensations. We have therefore little cause to envy those who are eminent in abilities and popularity, to covet such dangerous distinctions, to glory in any measure of them bestowed on us, or to despise such as are destitute of them. Numbers have thus been ruined; being lifted up in pride, they have come short of that salvation which they preached to others, or they have been betrayed into such evils as have caused them to terminate their days in disgrace and distress. And the few, who have not been apparently injured by eminency in gifts and popularity, have generally had more to relate concerning "thorns in "the flesh, and messengers of Satan to buffet them," than their more obscure and less admired brethren had any conception of.

V. 12—26.

We should first inquire, whether we have been baptized into the body of Christ by his regenerating grace? And whether we are drinking into his Spirit by receiving daily from his fulness? If this be our privilege, we should be abundantly thankful for so valuable a distinction, and contentedly occupy the place, which it hath pleased God to assign us in his Church; we should attentively consider the relation that we stand in to the Head, and to every member of this mystical body; seek to have our hearts filled with love to the whole, and to every part of the Church of Christ; estimate soberly the functions of our station, and expect to be enabled to perform them; watch against pride, ambition, envy, discontent, selfishness, contempt of others, and thus seek the good of the Church, of those in our own sphere of action, and of every individual, by properly improving our talents and performing the duty of our station. If situated in the lowest place, we should not disdain its services as beneath us; if advanced to a higher station, we should not imagine that we do not stand in need of the prayers and help of our feeblest and most obscure brethren; for these are essential to the perfection of the whole. Nay, we should guard and take care of the weak and feeble believer, even as the God of nature hath, with exquisite skill and kindness, defended those parts of the body, which, though essential to life and health, might otherwise easily have been wounded and destroyed, and cover with affectionate attention the infirmities and uncomeliness of those whom we deem real believers, and who are exposed to disgrace and contempt; that so the more abundant honour may be given to that part which lacked, seeing the more honourable part of our brethren have no need of such assistance and support. Our kind Creator hath effectually provided, that there should be no schism in our natural body; but he has, for wise reasons, seen good to make trial of the members of the mystical body of Christ in this respect; and through the remainder of error and sin in real Christians, through the intrusion of hypocrites, and the artifices of the enemy, many disgraceful and lamentable divisions still prevail.

V. 27—31.

In proportion as the members of Christ have not the same care of others as of themselves, very injurious consequences will appear. If we all filled up our several places in entire and equal love, there could be no envyings, jealousies, murmurs, vain glory, self-seeking, or disregard of others, any more than there is in heaven. We should in that case every one reciprocally care for all the rest; we should sympathize with the afflicted, tempted, distressed, or fallen believer, and help him as we could; we should feel ourselves sharers in the disgrace and reproach of the poor and needy, deem ourselves honoured and prospered, in the reputation, success, and usefulness of our more distinguished brethren, and rejoice in the consolation of such as were glad in the Lord. The meanest Christian would not then repine, or envy the most exalted, but rejoice and bless God on his account; the most eminent would not disregard the meanest, but would peculiarly endeavour to encourage and help him. Thus the good of the whole and of every part would be the uniform object of all, in every station, without any exception; and with the subordination of all personal interests and satisfactions to this superior end. Instead of coveting earnestly the highest stations, or the most conspicuous gifts; instead of acting as if all were to be apostles, prophets, teachers, and rulers; we should then unreservedly leave the appointment of his servants to God, and those whom he employs in his providence: and we should choose the more excellent way of love; endeavouring to occupy with our measure of ability and influence, for the good of our brethren, till our Lord come; remembering that they will not be most applauded at that time, who affected the chief places; but they who have been most faithful to the trust reposed in them, and most diligent in their Master's work.

NOTES.

CHAP. XIII. V. 1—3. The more effectually to expose the radical error of the Corinthians, in over-valuing spiritual gifts, and seeking their own credit in the use of them, without regard to the benefit of their brethren, the apostle in this chapter declares the most eminent of these gifts to be comparatively nothing, and love to be every thing. He had told them, that he would "show them a "more excellent way:" and he here averred, (as concerning himself, to give the less offence,) that if he could speak all the variety of human languages most perfectly, and if he could discourse in them with the eloquence of angels, or even use their heavenly language, yet, without charity, he should only resemble the unmeaning noise of the most common and less harmonious musical instruments. Nay, could he also deliver prophecies, which should be verified by the most signal accomplishment; if he could understand and even comprehend all divine mysteries; if he were possessed of all the natural and religious knowledge imaginable; and if he could exercise that special faith on the power of Christ, by which miracles were wrought, to such a degree that even mountains should literally be removed at his word, to the universal astonishment of mankind; yet, without charity, he should be nothing, not a Christian at all; and so far beneath the meanest believer on earth. Nay, if from pride, ostentation, or similar motives, he should give all his goods to feed the poor, even to the starving of himself; or if from party-zeal and obstinate attachment to a system, he should give his body to be burned as a martyr; yet, without charity, he could be nothing better than a deluded hypocrite, and should derive no benefit from it. The apostle meant to show, in the strongest instances imaginable, that nothing could prove a man a true believer, who had not charity. Some of the cases he states cannot be supposed to have ever existed; yet it seems evident, from Scripture, that a man might have the largest degree of that faith, by which miracles were performed, without any of the "faith that "worketh by love:" and that it is possible for a man to expend all his wealth in alms, and die a martyr for the truth, without saving grace! The word charity has been of late so appropriated to one external expression of love, which yet may be produced from other principles, that it is desirable for the word love to be here substituted, according to the exact meaning of the original, in order to render the passage more intelligible to common readers. 'It must here be taken in the noblest sense; for such a 'love to the whole Church, and the whole world, as arises 'from principles of true piety, and ultimately centers in 'God.' (Doddridge.)

V. 4—7. The effects of love which are here enumerated, show that the apostle primarily intended those exercises of that holy affection which respect mankind. Yet it is equally evident, that no natural benevolence, which subsists in an unbeliever's heart, can at all answer to the description here given. We must therefore conclude, that he meant that love which is the fruit of the Spirit in the believer's heart, by which especially his faith worketh. The humbled penitent, obtaining pardon and peace by faith in Christ, finds his self-confidence and his attachment to the world broken down: he has also been taught to love the perfections, the holiness, and the cause of God; the person, truth, and precepts of Christ, and his image in his people; to love his neighbours, and even his enemies, after Christ's example, and in obedience to his commands; and he now desires that they should all be happy, and God be glorified in their salvation. This love therefore includes all parties, nations, and characters, in its expansive exercise, though still capable of more particular attachments: it regards both the temporal and eternal interests of mankind; and the external comfort, as well as spiritual advantage of believers: and in subordination to the love of God, it seeks to promote the benefit of mankind, and the peace and prosperity of the Church, as its grand objects. This love is the unequivocal evidence of regeneration; and it is a better touchstone of men's professed faith in Christ, than even the love of God; because its effects may more easily be examined, and there is less danger of false affections in it. It was also that part of the Christian temper, in which the Corinthians were peculiarly defective: the apostle therefore selected this subject, to show them how low an estimate ought to be made of their religion. We must further observe that he described love as a man would gold, by enumerating its properties in the abstract. Wherever it subsisted, it had those properties, whether its quantity were small or great; and by this a man might estimate his own attainments in real religion. Some love might exist, where great remains of selfish passions obstructed its exercise; (as a little gold may be mixed with a large alloy of base metal;) but it would then become less evident, and the man's state more dubious. "Love suffereth long;" it influences a man, as far as it prevails, to endure the most provoking injuries and affronts for a long time together, without resentment or retaliation: it "is kind," even to the most injurious; persevering in endeavours to overcome evil with good, and delighting in showing kindness to all sorts of persons, by word and deed. "Love envieth not;" as far as it rules in the heart, it represses pride and selfishness, and causes men to rejoice in the comfort, advantage, and honour, even of those whom nature would regard as enemies or rivals. "Love vaunteth not itself;" it is a humble, unostentatious principle; it never prompts a man to boast, to push himself into notice, to prefer himself to others, to act with rashness and insolence, or in an overbearing dogmatical spirit. "It is not puffed up;" it never leads a person to be elated by endowments, offices, applause, or popularity; for where love prevails, these are only regarded and valued as means of good to others, communicated from God, to whom all the honour of them belongs. "Love "doth not behave itself unseemly;" it guides a man to a gentle, beneficent, courteous, compassionate, respectful conduct, suited to his employment, relative duties, age, and station: and thus it preserves him from rashness, and those improprieties, into which pride and selfishness betray others: for he who is influenced by love will keep the good of mankind continually before him as his object: and this will restrain him from those evil tempers and unbecoming actions, which would counteract his grand design. "Love seeketh not its own;" it never prompts men to seek their own ease, interest, credit, or indulgence, except in subordination to the welfare of others and the glory of God; and it does not allow them to seek any selfish end, in the use of their gifts and talents, which are conferred on them to profit others with. "Love is not easily "provoked;" it is not passionate and furious, any more than revengeful; it does not readily take offence even at many or great affronts, which pride and self-love would deem intolerable. "Love thinketh no evil;" it is unsuspecting, and not apt to impute men's conduct to bad motives without evident proof: it can therefore never prompt any one to invent or circulate slanders, to believe malicious reports, or even needlessly to expose the faults of others; but it will rather influence him to extenuate or conceal them. For "love rejoiceth not in iniquity;" it is not gratified, (as pride and malevolence are,) with the report of the vices and follies of others, though belonging to any party, or regarded as opposers; it rather influences a man to weep over it, and to desire that it should be found erroneous. "But love rejoiceth in the truth;" it excites joy in the heart, when the triumphs of the truth and the holy lives of such as profess it are mentioned; or when aspersed characters are vindicated by the truth being made known; or when persons of any sort act with truth, sincerity, and integrity, professing and adorning the truth of the Gospel. "Love beareth all things;" it covers all faults, as far as other duties will admit; it bears with the infirmities and mistakes of others with candour and kindness; and it submits to any inconvenience cheerfully, which this forbearance imposes. "Love believeth all things;" it disposes a person to believe the most favourably of all others, till the contrary be proved; to act as counsel for the accused; and even to credit a man's apologies for his faults, his professions of repentance, and his purposes of amendment. "Love hopeth all things;" it prompts a man to hope the best of another's character and intentions, that the case will fairly allow him; to hope for the conversion of the sinner, or the recovery of the back-slider; to proceed with hope in his attempts to do good to the most profligate obstinate, and ungrateful: and it allows no one to despair of others, to be wearied out by their perverseness, or to give over all endeavours for their good. In this desire and hope of finally succeeding, at least in some instances, "Love endureth all things;" it influences a man to bear any poverty, reproach, persecution, hardship, suffering, or even death, in seeking to do good to the bodies and souls of men, after the example of Christ, and in obedience to his commandments. It is obvious to every attentive reader, that in this beautiful description of the properties and effects of love, the apostle meant to show the Corinthians, that their conduct had in most particulars been an entire contrast to it. V. 8—12. The love which the apostle recommended, "never faileth:" it never loseth its value or excellency, it will never be changed for any other thing, nor will it ever fail out of that heart in which it hath taken root. On the other hand, even the gift of prophecy would fail: the Spirit of prophecy would soon be withdrawn from the Church; the instructions, given by the prophets from immediate revelation, would soon be superseded by more ordinary methods; and even the prophecies of the Scripture will all shortly be accomplished, and, having answered their end, will be of no further use. The gift of tongues was of no long continuance in the Church; and in heaven no acquaintance with human languages will be of any value. That philosophical knowledge, on which the Corinthians prided themselves, soon vanished as a dream: and even that kind and degree of religious knowledge, which is acquired on earth, will, as it were, be eclipsed by the perfect knowledge of heaven; as the light of the stars by the blaze of noon: or the knowledge, by which some were qualified to teach others the truth and will of God, would be of no further use. Here indeed the servants of God "knew in part, and so prophesied in part:" they had a small portion of his ways, works, and counsels, made known to them; but when the perfect discoveries of another world should be made, all this would be done away, as the useless taper in the day-time. This might be illustrated by the difference between the apprehensions of a child, and those of a man. The apostle could recollect, that when he was a child, he had talked in a childish and unsuitable manner about the affairs of men; and he had conceived of them, been affected by them, and reasoned about them, with much ignorance and misapprehension: but when he became a man, he not only put away his toys and childish pursuits, but his childish manner of speaking, thinking, and judging, as one ashamed of the impertinence and folly that had mixed with even the little knowledge which he had acquired. Thus, on earth, he could only conceive and speak as a child about divine things, when his present knowledge was compared with that of heaven. Though preserved from all error, yet he was aware, that he should find his views of them inadequate, unsuitable, and widely different from the real nature and glory of those sublime objects of contemplation. For he could here only see them "through a glass, "darkly;" as by the imperfect reflection of a mirror, or in the obscure description of a riddle. This view of them by faith, through the medium of revelation, is sufficient for the present state; but it is inadequate and obscure, compared with that view of them, which is obtained by those who "see face to face;" and who have an immediate, intuitive, and complete discovery of God, of Christ, and of heavenly things. So that the apostle's knowledge in part, of the truths and purposes of God, would be as nothing, when he came "to know, as he was "known;" and to perceive those objects with that clearness, fulness, and adequate conception of them, which corresponds to the perfect knowledge of God himself, as far as a finite mind can comprehend infinity.

V. 13. Not only was love more excellent and more enduring than all spiritual gifts, miraculous powers, and prophetical discoveries; but it even far exceeded in value all other Christian graces. After the ceasing of supernatural gifts in the Church, faith, hope, and love, abode, and will abide, to the end of the world, as the three principal graces, that distinguish Christians from other men, and in fact include all the others. Faith receives the testimony of God concerning invisible things, appropriates his instruction, and receives his salvation, by looking to and relying on the divine Redeemer, and the promises of God in him. Hope expects the promised blessings, as perfected in eternal life; and thus "it is the anchor of the soul," keeping it steadfast in obedience and patient waiting, amidst every kind of opposition and discouragement. And love to God, and to mankind for his sake, as before described, is the active principle of all those willing services, in which the Christian does good to his generation, by the will of God. These three abide, and must abide, as essential to godliness, under every dispensation and in every age, whatever other changes take place: but "the greatest of these "is love." Not that love can do the office of faith, in justifying the sinner, any more than the eye can perform the function of the ear: nor can this love be found in any man, who is not a partaker of faith and hope. But faith and hope are the means, or the intermediate acts of the mind, by which a proud, selfish, carnal, condemned criminal is brought to love a reconciled God, and to love men for his sake: they are as the scaffolding, without which the building cannot be erected; yet the building is more valuable than the scaffolding, and when that is completed, the other will be taken down as of no more use. For love is the very nature and image of God, the bond of perfection, the essence of holiness, and the fulfilling of the law. Faith and hope are only requisite for us, as sinners, in this imperfect state: faith will therefore soon be lost in vision, and hope in fruition; but perfect love will flourish for ever, the business, element, joy, and glory, of heaven itself; uniting God and all holy creatures in the most perfect harmony and felicity, without the least alloy of any contrary principle, through all the ages of eternity. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

CHAP. XIV.

The apostle exhorts the Corinthians to follow after love; and shows that prophecy, as most conducive to edification, is to be preferred to speaking with tongues, 1—5. Speaking in an unknown tongue, like indistinct musical sounds, is of no use to the hearers, 6—11. All gifts should be used in the most edifying manner, 12—20. Tongues are intended to convince unbelievers; but prophesying is more useful in the public assemblies, and to strangers who resort thither, 21—25. Rules for the orderly exercise of spiritual gifts in the Church, 26—33. Women are forbidden to speak there, 34, 35. A reproof of the self-sufficiency of some teachers, 36—38. Gifts must be exercised, and all things done "decently and in order," 39, 40.

his conspicuous endowments. Indeed, the powers or eloquence of angels, and all imaginable gifts of miracles or prophecy, cannot demonstrate a man to be any better than Balaam or Judas: and even the most astonishing liberality, or patient fortitude under persecution, even to tortures and death, may spring from other principles than love, and in that case will avail nothing before our heart-searching Judge. How then are they deluded, who expect acceptance and reward for those good works, which are as scanty in their degree, as they are corrupt and selfish in their principle! And how are even Christians often fascinated to over-rate ostentatious eloquence, gifts, and abilities, and to undervalue honest, simple, and unadorned love, which seeks only to do them good! But where does this heavenly love reside, which the apostle so warmly panegyrizes? Is she returned to heaven, being wearied out with our contentions and selfishness on earth? Or does she dwell in some obscure retreat, at a distance from the disputes of the world, and of the Church? Certainly she is but seldom seen among us, has but few votaries and little influence, and is treated with strange neglect on earth. Alas! numbers, who might be supposed to be somewhat, if we only looked at their talents, knowledge, and zeal, appear to be nothing, or very little, if love be the touchstone of their characters. Indeed, this chapter may be considered as an answer to all the wrangling pamphlets of angry disputers about religious truth, of different names and sentiments. Many of these seem incapable of long-suffering or kindness to any but their own party; so that envy, boasting, railing, ridicule, slander, and acrimony, are the prominent features of the portrait which they exhibit to the view of the public. In the most unseemly manner they sound their own praises, vent their own resentments, expose, and triumph over their opponents, forget all decent regard to superiors, and turn religious investigation into a vain-glorious, selfish, if not scurrilous, contest for victory. It is evident, that many of this character are easily provoked and hardly pacified; that they think evil of others, and rejoice in detecting the faults and follies of those who differ from them. In short, the attentive observer will perceive, that every part of the apostle's definition of love forms a complete contrast to the conduct of many, who in different ages have had numerous admirers for their zeal and ability, in contending for the sentiments, or forms, of their own sect or party. But, alas! we need more love than we generally possess, to animadvert on such abuses, without being betrayed into a measure of imitation. Let us then rather inquire, whether this divine love inhabit and influence our hearts? Have we learned to suffer long and to be kind? Are we taught to repress envy, and to rejoice in the superior reputation and success of our brethren? Hath love instructed us "in honour to esteem others better than ourselves," and cured us of insolence, rashness, and ostentation? Hath this divine principle guided us into a becoming behaviour to our superiors, equals, inferiors, opponents, competitors, friends, relatives, and all orders of men in the Church or the community? Have we attained the habit of giving up our own interest or inclination, whenever the good of others requires it? Can we bear affronts without being easily provoked? Are we disposed to be unsuspecting; to mourn over the sins of others; to bear with their infirmities, dulness, and perverseness; to believe, hope, and endure all things, for their sakes? If some sparks of this heavenly flame have been kindled in our hearts, we know that there is much of a contrary nature to counteract its efficacy. Here then is a call for watchfulness, diligence, and prayer, that our "love may abound yet more and more in knowledge and in all judgment:" and that our selfish nature may be more entirely subdued and mortified. Hence we shall also see still more our need of the cleansing blood of Christ; and shall learn to walk humbly before God, and to bear with others, as conscious that we need the patient forbearance both of the Lord and of our brethren.

V. 8—13.

If this love is planted in our hearts, (though as an exotic in an unfriendly soil and climate,) it will never fail, but will certainly grow up to maturity: and it will flourish abundantly, when prophecies shall have ceased, and when human science and eloquence shall have vanished away; and when even our highest attainments in divine knowledge in this present world, (which are indeed very small, compared with those of the apostle,) will appear like the lispings, the imaginations, and the reasonings of a little child. But if that feeble, indistinct view, which we obtain by faith in the mirror of the sacred word, be so delightful, as we have sometimes found it, with what raptures shall we see face to face, and know, "even as we are known!" Let us then put away the childish things, which amused us in an unconverted state; for so we now clearly see them to have been: let us learn to value things according to their intrinsic worth, and not, as children, admire all that glitters, whether it be gold or tinsel: let us cease from our childish pursuits about mere externals and non-essentials, that we may value and seek an increase of faith, hope, and love, from the Giver of all good gifts: and whilst we contend, that faith alone can justify the sinner by forming his relation to the Saviour, and that hope only can support the soul, amidst all the trials of life and death, let us remember, that Love is still greater than these useful and needful graces; being the evidence of our title to eternal life, and the meetness for and earnest of that holy and unspeakable felicity.

NOTES.

CHAP. XIV. V. 1—5. Having shown the excellency of love, the apostle exhorted the Corinthians to follow after it, as the great object of their unremitting pursuit, in preference to all other things: and then they would do well earnestly to desire spiritual gifts, that they might be enabled to be useful to their brethren; for under the influence of love, they would certainly thus use them; especially they should value "the gift of prophesying." By this the apostle seems to have intended an immediate communication from the Spirit of God, concerning the meaning of the Holy Scriptures, or some point of doctrine or practice, in which the Church or individuals wanted instruction at the time. This was a gift bestowed on several, by which they became occasional, or extraordinary, teachers in the Church, and it seems to have generally been accompained by the power of predicting future events, when circumstances required it. The Corinthians, however, did not value it so much as the gift of tongues, or of miracles, because it was less suited to excite admiration; but the apostle instructed them, that it was greatly to be preferred by them, because more useful in their situation. For he who spake in a language which the hearers understood not, did not speak to men, but to God only; nor would others receive any benefit, though under the impulse of the Holy Spirit he spake the most sublime mysteries of the Gospel, in the most suitable words. Whereas, he that prophesied spake to men, to edify them in divine truth, to exhort them to holy practice, or to comfort them under their manifold trials. Indeed, he who spake in an unknown tongue might derive instruction and benefit from his own words, and his faith might be established by the exercise of this miraculous gift, in case he was not elated with pride, and influenced by ostentation. But he that prophesied would edify numbers, which would be far more desirable. As the apostle rejoiced in every thing conducive to their prosperity, he desired that they might all be endued with the gift of tongues; but still more, that they should all be capable of instructing others, by the gift of prophesying; for the prophet was certainly a more honourable and useful person, than he who spake with tongues; except the latter were also endued with the gift of interpreting his discourse into the language understood by his hearers, that so the Church might be edified by what he spake. This was not generally the case; for a man might be miraculously enabled to speak in one, two, or more languages which he had never learned; and yet, being left ignorant of others, he might be unable to explain his meaning to those, who neither understood the language in which he spake, nor that which was his native tongue. Or, to counterpoise this distinction, which tended so much to elate the possessors, they might be left incapable of giving utterance with propriety, perspicuity, or promptitude, suited to a public assembly, even in their native tongue, to those divine truths which they spake fluently in another language, under the influence of the Holy Spirit: and another man might be miraculously enabled to understand, and interpret into the language of the audience, what was thus spoken, who yet himself might be unable to speak fluently in the language which he interpreted. Even in ordinary cases, clearly understanding a language, and being able to speak fluently in it, are very distinct attainments. 'Why 'was the gift of tongues conferred? That the mysteries 'of God might be openly made known to more people and 'nations. Then, surely prophecy, to which the gift of 'tongues was intended to be subservient, must be of supe'rior excellency.' (Beza.)

10 There are, it may be, so many kinds of voices in the world, and none of them is without signification.

11 Therefore if I know not the meaning of the voice, [a] I shall be unto him that speaketh a barbarian, and he that speaketh shall be a barbarian unto me.

12 Even so ye, [b] forasmuch as ye are zealous of * spiritual gifts, [c] seek that ye may excel to the edifying of the church.

13 Wherefore let him that speaketh in an unknown tongue, [d] pray that he may interpret.

14 For if I pray in an unknown tongue, [e] my spirit prayeth, but my understanding is unfruitful.

15 [f] What is it then? [g] I will pray with the spirit, and I will pray with the understanding also: I will sing with the spirit, [h] and I will sing with the understanding also.

16 Else when thou shalt [i] bless with the spirit, how shall he that occupieth the room of the [k] unlearned say, [l] Amen, at thy giving of thanks, seeing he understandeth not what thou sayest?

17 For thou verily givest thanks well, [m] but the other is not edified.

18 I [n] thank my God, I speak with tongues more than you all:

19 Yet [o] in the church I had rather speak five words with my understanding, that by my voice I might teach others also, than ten thousand words in an unknown tongue.

V. 6—12. To convince the Corinthians, without needless offence, of what he had asserted, the apostle put the case, that, when he came next to Corinth, he should merely display his gift of speaking in a variety of languages; of what use in that case would his visit be to them? Surely of none; except he spake intelligibly, either by immediate revelation from God, or by some prophetical message suited to their case, or concerning some doctrine in which they wavered or were mistaken. Unless, in some of these ways, (which indeed it is difficult for us to distinguish with exactness,) he gave them clear instructions, all that he could say in unknown languages would be an unmeaning noise. For even lifeless things that are used to give sound, such as musical instruments, can give no direction to those who are to sing and dance to them, unless a proper distinction be observed in the sounds: and if the trumpet should be blown at random, without any distinction between that sound which calls the combatants to the field, and other sounds of different meaning, what soldier could understand when to prepare himself for the battle? If then, an intelligible distinction of sounds was necessary in the ordinary concerns of life, much more must they be so in those of religion. For, unless they uttered significant and intelligible words, how could the hearers understand what was spoken? They might as well speak in an empty room or an unfrequented desert, where their words would be lost in the air, and never reach any human ear. There were indeed as many languages or idioms in the world, as there were different regions; and each of these was significant to the persons accustomed to it. That circumstance therefore ought to be considered; otherwise, even in ordinary conversation, the speaker and hearer, who understand not each other, would appear reciprocally barbarians to each other, however expressive, polite, and copious the languages were in which they spake; and they would be more likely to despise each other, than to profit by the interview, or be satisfied with it. In the common concerns of life, therefore, it was thus requisite for men to understand each other; and surely the Corinthians, amidst their zeal, and emulous desire of spiritual gifts, ought to act consistently with common sense, and desire to excel in those things by which they might edify the Church; and not in such as could only procure them irrational admiration! 'At this day, among the papists, they are used in 'their sermons, always to quote the sacred Scriptures in 'Latin, without adding a translation in the vulgar tongue; 'nor do they use any other method, in the singing and 'prayers." (Beza.) 'If you that have the gift of strange 'languages do not speak that which the auditors may un'derstand; (for to that end sure were those languages giv'en) that you might speak to every one in his own language, (Acts ii. 6;) how shall any one be better for your language?" (Hammond.)

V. 13—19. If any of them must needs speak in an unknown tongue among their brethren, let them pray to be endued also with the gift of interpreting what was spoken, or what others delivered in a foreign language, that their religious exercises might not be a mere ostentatious display of their powers, without meaning or use. Supposing the apostle should come and pray with the congregation in an unknown tongue, his spirit or heart might indeed be very devoutly engaged in the worship of God, while exercising this gift of the Holy Spirit; but, as others could not understand him, so his own understanding would be unfruitful, having no just and proper exercise, and producing no benefit to his fellow-worshippers. What would then be the proper inference from this observation? Truly, he would pray from the fulness of his spiritual affections, and in the sober exercise of his understanding also, by using such words as might edify others and enable them to join with him. In like manner, when he sang the praises of God, he would endeavour to have his spiritual affections engaged as much as possible; yet he would also consider, as a rational man, what language would be best understood by the congregation. But if any of them, neglecting this dictate of common sense, should celebrate the praises of God, and return thanks for his mercies, in the most spiritual and fervent manner, but in an unknown tongue, how could he, who occupied the place of a private believer, who had neither learning, nor the gift of tongues, give his assent to the thanksgiving, by saying, Amen, as was customary among them; (Marg. Ref.) seeing he had not understood any thing which was spoken? The one might give thanks in a very proper manner; but the other could derive no benefit from it. Many indeed of the Corinthians supposed themselves to excel in this particular gift, and were pleased to make a show of it: but the apostle thanked God, that, as commissioned to preach to the Gentiles, of whatever nation, he spake with tongues more than they all, and was enabled to preach in more languages; the whole praise of which he gave to the Lord. Yet he had rather utter five words, or the shortest instructive sentence, among believers in the public assembly, in a rational manner, so that others might understand him and be edified by what he said, than irrationally to speak ten thousand words, or the most copious discourse, in an unknown tongue, which could be of no use to them. Had the apostle lived about the Æra of the reformation, and written expressly against the Church of Rome, he could not more emphatically have exposed the absurdity and wickedness of worshipping God, and performing all public services in Latin, of which the common people understand not one word. No wonder the rulers of that Church lock up the scriptures also in an unknown tongue; seeing they must otherwise bear too evident a testimony against them. With the understanding. (15.) That is, say most commentators, so as to be understood. This indeed is implied, and principally intended; yet examples of such a use of the words cannot easily be adduced. But might not the apostle mean, that they who spoke publicly in a language not understood by the auditors, however fervent their affections, or excellent their gifts might be, seemed to act like men without understanding, or who made no use of their understanding; seeing no man, however irrational and enthusiastical, could act more evidently against the plain dictates of sober reason and sound judgment? Does not the apostle's argument about prayer imply, that if any one prayed or gave thanks extempore, in a language understood by the congregation, the people might, if nothing else prevented, cordially say Amen to his words? And does not this remark sufficiently answer many common objections, and arguments, against extempore prayer? It, however, by no means decides, whether that, or a liturgy, be most conducive to general edification, in the present state of the Church.

V. 20—25. These intimations of the ignorance and childishness of the Corinthians, who were evidently in no small degree disposed to self-wisdom, are very remarkable. As they professed to have much knowledge, let them not be "children in understanding;" for it was really as trifling and vain to make a parade of the gift of tongues, merely to astonish those who could not understand them, as any of the competitions and amusements of children could be. Let them indeed be as infants in respect of malice, and every evil disposition; being of a gentle forgiving disposition, without resentment or rancour: but let them be men in understanding, as those that were matured in judgment and experience, and capable of acting with propriety and wisdom in their whole conduct. In the law, (or in the Old Testament,) God had foretold, that he would speak to Israel by men of other lips, and yet even then they would not hear him. (Marg. Ref.) This seems primarily to have related to the languages of those foreign nations, by whom God intended to execute vengeance on Israel: but it might also denote, that he would instruct them by persons endued with the gift of tongues, to convince them of the truth. So that this gift, when exercised among such as did not understand what was spoken, was to be considered rather as a rebuke than a favour; but in its proper use, it was intended for a sign to unbelievers, in order to their conversion, whereas, prophesying was more immediately intended for the edification of believers. Yet the gift of tongues might be so perverted, as even to prove exceedingly injurious to unbelievers, and this ought to be taken into the account. If, therefore, the whole Church of Corinth should be assembled in one place, and all who were able should speak with tongues, several at once, and others in succession, whilst the rest understood not what was spoken; and if any person, uninstructed in Christianity, or disposed to reject it, should come in to make his observations, would not such irrational and confused proceedings confirm his prejudices, and cause him to conclude that they were a company of madmen, or frantic enthusiasts? But if they all prophesied, and one teacher after another spake by the Spirit of God, in a pertinent, instructive, and convincing manner, on some point of doctrine or practice, the stranger who occasionally came among them, would hear something from every one to convince his understanding, to awaken his conscience, and to move his affections; he would find his secret objections answered, his secret thoughts divulged, his secret sins reproved, and the real state of his heart and soul made known to him, though before they were unperceived. And this might be expected, by the divine blessing, to produce a full persuasion of the truth and excellency of the Gospel: so that it would often happen, that the curious or ignorant despiser would be suddenly changed into a humble worshipper, and that under his deep conviction, he would even prostrate himself in adoration of the living God; acknowledging that the glorious Lord was evidently present in the midst of the assembled Christians, and evidently spake by them for the instruction of the hearers. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 26—33. How then ought their public meetings to be ordered and conducted? When they came together, all, who were endued with gifts, were ready eagerly to seize the opportunity of exercising them: so that one would begin to sing a psalm or spiritual song, another to discourse on some doctrine, another to speak in an unknown tongue, another to declare some special revelation that had been made to him, or another to interpret what had been spoken. Thus several would speak at the same time, in different parts of the assembly; and while every one was more desirous to be heard and admired, than to hear and be edified, the whole scene became confused, and the great end of their coming together was overlooked.—As a general rule by which such abuses might be remedied, they should always take care, that all things were done with a view to their common edification. If then any of them chose to speak in an unknown tongue, let no more than two, or at most three, one after another, exercise this gift, at one meeting, and let some one interpret his discourse. But if none present were enabled to do this, let him, who was about to speak in an unknown tongue, be silent; and be content, on proper occasions, to speak to himself and to God in meditation and prayer; without obtruding his unintelligible words upon the congregation, who ought to be more profitably employed. Let the prophets also speak by two or three at the same meeting, in due order; and let those prophets especially, who were silent, exercise their judgment upon what was spoken, to determine whether it accorded with the Scripture, as false prophets might creep in among them. In case any thing should be immediately revealed to one who sat by, which required present attention, let the first, on a proper intimation given, keep silence till that had been considered: or, as some render it, let the other wait till the first had done speaking. For they needed not be eager to speak first; seeing by properly waiting they might all prophesy, (who had that gift,) and all be edified. Nor could it be urged, that the divine impulse upon their minds constrained them to speak immediately, as the frantic heathen priests and priestesses did; for the spirits of the prophets, (their minds when most powerfully influenced by the Holy Spirit,) were subject to government, and might be restrained, directed, and regulated by reason and judgment, as at other times. That gracious God, whose Spirit spake by them, was by no means the Author of confusion and disorder, such as must ensue from the vehement utterance of many speakers at once, vying with each other who should attract most attention; but of peace, harmony, mutual love, and good order: as it was evident in the conduct of all the churches of the saints, in this and other particulars.

V. 34, 35. (xi. 3—16.) To reconcile these verses with the Scripture referred to, it seems most natural to suppose, that some of the Corinthian women were used to speak publicly, when not under any immediate or extraordinary impulse of the Holy Spirit; and perhaps they interrupted the other speakers by inquiries or objections, according to the disputatious spirit that prevailed. The apostle therefore laid it down as a general rule, (to which the foregoing case was the only exception,) that women must not be allowed to speak in the public congregation, or to assume the office of teachers or disputants: for this by no means consisted with the obedience to their husbands which the law of God inculcated. But if they met with any thing in the public instructions, which they could not understand or assent to, let them wait till they went home, and then ask their husbands about it, who were supposed able and willing to inform them, and who were the most proper persons for them to confer with. For it was inconsistent with modesty and propriety, and would be scandalous among their neighbours, for women to make a practice of discoursing in the public assemblies.

V. 36—40. The abuses here reproved were peculiar to the Church at Corinth, yet they deemed themselves a model for others to imitate! Was then theirs the mother-church, from whom the preachers of the Gospel had first come forth? Or had the word of God reached them alone? As it was evident neither of these was the case, and as many churches had been planted before them, why did they presume to set themselves up above, or against, the wholesome regulations observed elsewhere? Indeed, some of their ambitious teachers might be strenuous in supporting the innovations which had been introduced, professing that he was a prophet, or a spiritual man, 'that is, one 'well qualified, by religious instruction, to understand 'and judge about spiritual things, as opposed to the carnal 'man, and the babe in Christ.' (iii. 1.) (Beza.) And if he really were so, let him show it, by acknowledging these things to be the commandments of Christ, by his apostle. But if any man was, or pretended to be, ignorant of Paul's apostolical authority, and of the obligation of these instructions, let him continue ignorant, for he would not enter into any further debate with him. Upon the whole, therefore, the apostle exhorted them to desire to prophesy, in preference to all other spiritual gifts, yet not to forbid speaking with tongues, but let all things relative to their public assemblies be regulated with a strict regard to decorum, propriety, and regularity, as this must tend most to their own edification, and the credit of the Gospel among unbelievers, as well as the most honourable and acceptable to God. To adduce this text as a direct argument about any particular external ceremonies used in divine worship, (which always appear decent and orderly to those who invent and impose them, and the contrary to those who dissent from them,) is doubtless wresting it from its proper meaning.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

All our pursuits should spring from love, as the grand motive; and this we ought to follow without wearying, though it seem to flee from us. Every endowment or possession is valuable in proportion to its usefulness, and all public ordinances should be conducted as may most tend to the edification, exhortation, and consolation of believers, and the conversion of sinners. Even fervent spiritual affection must be governed by the sober exercise of the understanding, or else, with the best intentions, men will run into great extravagancies, and disgrace the truth which they mean to promote. What shall I profit? Or, in what respect shall I be profited? are proper inquiries, when we are considering in what manner to conduct our meeting together for religious exercises. Ministers especially should not only study to exercise their gifts with acceptance and reputation, but inquire, in the first place, what advantage their hearers may derive from their subjects, and their manner of treating them. Alas! for want of this, many a good speaker, in delivering an eloquent and admired discourse, is even more unmeaning than "things without life giving sound;" and if they who play on musical instruments made no more exact distinction in their sounds, than many preachers do in their doctrine and exhortation, they would be unfit even to direct the motions of dancers, much more to call the soldier to arm for the battle.

V. 12—25.

Whilst we reasonably exclaim against prayers and worship in an unknown tongue, and thank God for emancipating us from so absurd an imposition, we should inquire, whether some, who use the language of their country, do not affect such elegant phrases, such sonorous words, and such learned discussions, that they render themselves as unintelligible to the common people, as if they preached in Latin or Greek? This, alas! is sometimes in a measure the case with preachers whose doctrine is worthy of attention; for, as to many public teachers, obscurity is their best qualification. If we use language in any respect above the capacities of our most illiterate and weakest hearers, to please a few who are more learned and polite, how shall they, who most need instruction, know what is spoken? Indeed, it might as well be spoken to the air. But if we speak in plain, simple, and perspicuous language, which even children may understand, (and this does not imply coarseness and vulgarity,) we may be sure that the more intelligent part of our audience will be edified, if disposed to receive instruction. And surely a minister of Christ should more desire to "excel for the edifying of the "Church," than in order to obtain the character of a polite, eloquent, or learned speaker! Whatever judgment others may form, all who are actuated by the love and zeal of the apostle, will choose to speak five words so as to be understood, rather than ten thousand words in an unknown tongue, and will waive the display of their natural or acquired abilities, from the same motive that the apostle did his gift of divers tongues. Whether we pour out our prayers, sing the praises of God, or thank him for his mercies, we should be careful to unite spiritual affec-

CHAP. XV.

The apostle states the gospel, which he had preached at Corinth, and shows how fully the resurrection of Christ had been demonstrated, 1—11. He proves that the resurrection of the dead is inseparable from that of Christ; so that the denial of it is subversive of Christianity, and of all the hopes of Christians, 12—19: but Christ, the First-fruits, being risen, all others shall arise in due order, till death the last enemy being subdued, the kingdom shall be delivered up to the Father, 20—28; otherwise it would be in vain for any to risk their lives, as the apostle did, 29—32. He warns and reproves the Corinthians, refutes objections, and illustrates his doctrine, 33—41; shows the manner of the resurrection; and the change which will be wrought both in the dead, and those who shall then be found living, 42—53. As death will at length be thus swallowed up in victory; he triumphs in hope over death and the grave, through Christ, 54—57; and concludes with an animated exhortation to steady and persevering diligence in the work of the Lord, 58.

tions with sober judgment, and they who lead in social worship should use such language as may affect and instruct the meanest fellow-worshipper, and enable him to add his cordial Amen to what is spoken. We should, indeed, be as children, in respect of malice and revenge; and a child-like docility, simplicity, dependence, and submission, become us; but childish deviations from the maxims of good sense and sober reason are unbecoming the disciples of Christ, who should endeavour to attain a ripeness in wisdom and understanding, and to "walk wisely "towards them that are without." For though religious ordinances ought to be peculiarly directed to the edification of believers, yet provision should also be made for those unbelievers, who may come among us, to make their remarks; nor should any thing be admitted, which may reasonably excite their disgust, or needlessly confirm their prejudices. They are ready enough to conclude that we are enthusiastic or mad, without our giving them any ground for the charge; and the more willing we are to bear unmerited contempt and reproach, the more careful should we be not to deserve them. This hath not been sufficiently attended to, and many things have been said and done, without warrant from Scripture, by good men, which have sent away occasional hearers riveted in their prejudices against the truth, and disposed to ridicule it in every company. But when the word of God is soberly spoken, with an address both to the understanding and the affections, and with a close application to the conscience, occasional hearers are often unexpectedly impressed, being judged, convinced, and arraigned, by what they hear. The very secrets of their hearts seem to be disclosed by the experimental address of the preacher, and they are induced to join in that worship which they before despised, and to confess that God is of a truth among those persons, whom perhaps they came prepared to deride.

V. 26—40.

In all things edification should be aimed at; ambition, emulation, and self-preference, should be steadily repressed; men should be "swift to hear and slow to speak," more ready to receive than forward to give instruction, and willing, (unless the case require the contrary,) to speak to themselves and to God, leaving others to edify the congregation to better advantage. When professors of evangelical doctrine, who imagine themselves qualified and called to be teachers, are so full of their subject, that they cannot refrain from speaking, however unadvised or irregular their conduct may be, it is evident that they are more influenced by self-sufficiency and ambition, than by humble zeal and love. For the Spirit of God moves the will and affections, in a manner consistent with the exercise of sober reason and discretion. "Even the spirits of "the prophets were subject to the prophets," and doubtless this must be at least equally the case with inferior teachers. For God is the Author of peace and good order, not of confusion; and he never teaches men to neglect their relative duties, to act unbecoming their age and station, or inconsistent with decency and regularity. Indeed, restrictions of this kind are not regarded by many, who deem themselves immediately influenced by the Spirit of God, and more spiritual and zealous than their prudent brethren; yet it behooves them to show that they are so, by acknowledging such regulations to be the commandments of Christ, and excellently suited to render the worship and conduct of his people respectable before men, and honourable to him. Whereas deviations from them often lead to those things which are indeed shameful, and suited to prejudice men's minds against the Gospel, as if it dissolved relative obligations, put an end to all regular subordination, and taught even women to act inconsistently with that modesty, which is their peculiar ornament and honour. But if men will remain ignorant of such things, after proper instruction and warning, it is not adviseable to be always debating with them; we must leave them, and take heed to ourselves. However valuable these miraculous gifts were in the primitive Church, we cannot well read this epistle without cheerfully acquiescing in the will of God, as to his withholding them from us. Man's heart is so prone to pride, ostentation, and folly, that even endowments of this kind were made occasions of grievous sins and offences! Our vain-glory is sufficiently excited by inferior and ordinary gifts or abilities, and this militates greatly against our usefulness and peace. Let us then be contented with our present means and methods of instruction; let us endeavour to do all things decently and in order; and most desire that grace which sanctifies and humbles the soul, and so prepares it for heavenly felicity.

NOTES.

CHAP. XV. V. 1—11. The apostle here entered on another subject. The Corinthians were tinctured with the Sadducean spirit of Jewish skeptics; or rather with the philosophizing temper of the Grecians, who derided the doctrine of the resurrection, and denied the possibility of it. Some asserted that virtue was its own reward, and that the expectation of a future recompense was a mean unworthy motive. So that, certain persons at Corinth began to teach, that there would be no resurrection; allegorizing or explaining away what had been revealed or declared to them on that subject; though it does not appear that they denied the immortality of the soul. In order to stop the progress of so pernicious an error, the apostle began by stating the substance of the doctrine that he had taught them, which they had received by faith, as a divine testimony, in which he supposed them still to be steadfast, and by which they would certainly be saved, (being already brought into a safe state,) in case they remembered and cleaved to what he had delivered to them: this they would do, unless they had believed with a vain, empty, and inefficient faith, in which case they might be left to embrace tenets subversive of the whole doctrine of Christ. In the first place, and as a matter of the greatest importance, he had delivered to them, even as he had received it of the Lord Jesus, that he, the Messiah, the Son of God, had died a spotless sacrifice of infinite value for the sins of mankind, as "the Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world," in order, that "all who believe in him should not perish, but have everlasting life:" and this agreed with the types, prophecies, and promises of the Scriptures. That, being really dead, Pilate had delivered his body to Joseph of Arimathea to be buried; and that on the third day he arose again, as it had been foretold. (Marg. Ref.) To demonstrate his resurrection, on which the whole of his religion rested, he first appeared to Peter; then in the evening of that day to those of the twelve apostles who were assembled; and on the evening of the succeeding first day of the week, when Thomas was present and confessed him as his "Lord and God:" that afterwards he appeared to above five hundred disciples at once, doubtless in Galilee, where he was most known, where many of his disciples lived, and where he appointed to meet the apostles. Most of these had been still preserved to be living witnesses of that great event; though some had fallen asleep, having died in faith and hope, and so departed to be present with their Lord. Afterwards James was favoured with a visit from his risen Saviour: probably, this was James the son of Alpheus who wrote the epistle, but we have no other account of this appearance of Christ. Then he was seen of all the apostles, before and at his ascension: and last of all he had graciously manifested himself to Paul also, in such a manner, that he could not but assuredly know him to be Jesus who had been crucified. In this, the Lord had acted with peculiar condescension and mercy; because he was so vile and worthless, that he was more properly to be deemed an untimely birth, or an abortion, than in any way entitled to such distinguished favour. 'Suetonius says, that there were, in the time of Augustus, an enormous number of senators, and most of them most unworthy of that dignity, having, after the death of Cæsar, by favour and bribery gotten to be elected. These the multitude proverbially styled abortives. St. Paul, like them, was none of the regular number of the twelve, first taken in, in Christ's life-time, no way worthy to be an apostle; and yet by Christ's grace, and special favour, called and admitted to this dignity.' (Hammond.) In this respect he considered himself as the least of the apostles, and unworthy to be numbered among them, seeing he had so wickedly and cruelly persecuted the Church of God; (though in gifts and authority he was not

12 ¶ Now [c] if Christ be preached that he rose from the dead, [d] how say some among you that there is no resurrection of the dead?

13 But [e] if there be no resurrection of the dead, then is Christ not risen:

14 And if Christ be not risen, [f] then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain.

15 Yea, and we are found [g] false witnesses of God; because [h] we have testified of God that he raised up Christ: [i] whom he raised not up, if so be that the dead rise not.

16 For if the dead rise not, then is not Christ raised:

17 And if Christ be not raised, [k] your faith is vain; [l] ye are yet in your sins.

18 Then they also which are [m] fallen asleep in Christ, are perished.

19 If in [n] this life only we have [o] hope in Christ, we are [p] of all men most miserable.

a whit behind the chiefest of them.) However, by the rich mercy and powerful grace of God, he was at length brought to be a Christian and an apostle, and to be employed in many important services: nor was this distinguishing favour shown him in vain, seeing he had been constrained by the love of Christ and of souls to labour more abundantly than any of the other apostles. Yet this was not to be ascribed to him, or to any thing in his natural disposition more towardly than others, but wholly to the grace of God that was with him, which both wrought the willing mind, and gave him the ability thus to abound in the work of the Lord. As therefore all the apostles had been witnesses of Christ's resurrection, so both they and he had every where preached the same doctrines. These were then to be considered as the grand peculiarities of Christianity, which could not be denied, without virtually attempting to subvert the whole system.—Several other appearances of Christ after his resurrection have been considered in the evangelists; but this account mentions circumstances not before recorded, and it illustrates that important subject. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 12—18. All the apostles preached the resurrection of Christ as an undoubted fact, a fundamental doctrine, and the great demonstration of the truth of the Gospel: how then was it that some Corinthians ventured to declare that no resurrection of the dead was to be expected? Probably they argued against the possibility or credibility of such an event; and then endeavoured to put a figurative construction on the testimony of apostles or prophets concerning it. This was, in reality, a denial of Christ's resurrection; for that authenticated fact demonstrated the possibility of the dead being raised: it confirmed all that he had taught about that doctrine, and it was an earnest of the resurrection of all believers; so that to invalidate the resurrection of Jesus, would subvert Christianity itself. For this was the grand proof that he was the Messiah: it evinced the acceptance of his atonement; and it made way for his ascension, intercession, and mediatorial kingdom. The whole, therefore, of the doctrine taught by the apostles, was so closely connected with the resurrection of Christ, that, if that could be disproved, their preaching would be evinced to be useless and delusory, and the faith of their hearers groundless and unprofitable. Yea, they would be convicted of bearing false witness in this sacred cause, as if God had needed such base frauds to support religion in the world! which in some respects was bearing false witness against him. And, notwithstanding all the miracles wrought by them, their self-denying labours, holy lives and patient sufferings unto death, it would be proved that they combined together to deceive mankind with a most egregious falsehood! For the general proposition, "that "there is no resurrection," includes in it that particular one, "that Christ is not risen;" and the resurrection of others can only need a continuation of that same omnipotent exertion which raised him from the grave. But if Christ was not risen, their faith was vain, and "they "were yet in their sins," as no repentance or reformation could possibly take away their guilt, and nothing could prove that Christ's atonement had been accepted, except his resurrection from the dead. Nay, further, they who had died in the faith, and fallen asleep in Jesus, whether by a natural death or as martyrs, had certainly perished in their sins if Christ was not risen; for whatever might be urged on other grounds for the immortality of the soul, there could be no other way of forgiveness, acceptance, and eternal life, than through the merit of his sacrifice, the belief of which could not consist with the denial of his resurrection. As the persons spoken of had actually repented, renounced sin, and walked in newness of life, they could not have perished in their sins, except through the want of a sacrifice sufficient to expiate their guilt: and thus the apostle's argument concerning our Lord's resurrection, demonstrates that he and the primitive Church universally regarded the doctrine of the real Atonement of Christ's death as essential to Christianity. 'If 'Christ be not risen for our justification, we are yet 'under the guilt of sin; and if so, both body and soul 'must perish after death, and then the hope of Christians 'must terminate with this life.' (Whitby.)

V. 19. If the consolations derived from the hope and earnests of another life were to be thus torn from Christians, and they had no other benefit from Christ than what related to this present life, they would be of all men most miserable. Some explain this wholly of the apostles, as exposed to peculiar hardships and sufferings, and as peculiarly guilty in propagating an imposture, if indeed Christ was not risen; but there seems no proof that this restriction was intended. It does not follow that Christians would in fact be more unhappy than other men, if there should be no future reward; for even then their hopes of it, and that consolation which is thence derived, would counterbalance their peculiar trials, self-denials, and hardships; but if this hope and consolation were taken from them, they would indeed be more miserable than other men, having lost their relish for those vain pleasures which alone could be hoped for, experiencing, earnest desires, which must certainly be disappointed, and enduring many peculiar evils, without any peculiar support and consolation. The fact, however, is, that Christians have not only the hope of a future felicity, (which even if groundless must afford great consolation whilst it prevails,) but also the earnests, the beginnings, and first-fruits of it, in those holy affections towards God, and that joy in him, which a stranger intermeddleth not with, and therefore they are so far from being of all men most miserable, that they of all men enjoy the most solid comfort, amidst their difficulties and trials, and even in the seasons of the sharpest persecutions. Many of the Corinthians were not aware what dangerous inferences were fairly deducible from the tenets to which they had listened, and their false teachers would doubtless disavow them; yet it was proper thus to expose them, that they might be put upon their guard, and not patronize opinions pregnant with such mischief to the souls of men, and so destructive of the amimating hopes and comforts of all believers.

V. 20—28. The apostle, having established the fact of Christ's resurrection, from that fact shows the certainty of our resurrection, and then, from the important questions in the thirty-fifth verse, he takes occasion to descant on the glorious change that shall take place in the bodies of the saints, and finally he tramples on death by the consideration of a resurrection and glorious immortality.—This is the plan, or method, and the coherence of the parts, in this noble chapter. In opposition to the errors above noticed, the apostle testified with authority, as fully instructed by immediate revelation, that Christ was risen from the dead, and was become the first-fruits of the whole harvest of those that slept in death, even of all believers who had died from the beginning, and of all who should die to the end of the world. He was the First who arose to die no more, and the most illustrious of all, who ever should arise; he arose as a public Person, as the Surety, the Representative, and the Fore-runner of his saints; his resurrection was a pledge and assurance of theirs, and as the first-fruits presented to God, to sanctify and secure his blessing upon the whole crop. For, as by man sin and death entered into the world, so by Man, by One in human nature, came the resurrection of the dead; and, as in consequence of their relation to Adam, all men are born mortal, and at length die, even so, in and by Christ, shall all be made alive. All men, through his undertaking, being placed under a dispensation of mercy, shall be raised from the dead, that their future state may be accordingly determined; yet none will be finally benefited, but they who are one with him by faith, and the participation of his life-giving Spirit; and of these the apostle particularly treats in this chapter. This resurrection must be effected in an orderly manner, according to the appointment of God; Christ himself hath been the First-fruits: hereafter, at his coming, his redeemed people will be raised before others, and at last the wicked will arise also. Then the end of this present state of things will arrive, and the solemnities of the final judgment being concluded, Christ will deliver up the mediatorial kingdom to God, even to the Father from whom he received it; having previously put down all authority and power, which have been placed in opposition to his cause and kingdom. For he must reign till all enemies be subjected to him, for thus it had been predicted, and the Scripture cannot be broken. Of these enemies, death will be the last that will be put under the Redeemer's feet, when he hath finally delivered all his people from this universal conqueror, and entirely abolished him. For when it is said that JEHOVAH hath put all things under the feet of Christ, it is evidently meant of all creatures, and with an exception of the great Creator, who put all things under him; so that, when all things shall be subdued to the incarnate Son, and when the end of his mediatorial authority shall be thus completely answered, then will the Son himself, as Man and Mediator, be subject under Him, who hath put all things under him; all the power and authority will be acknowledged to have been of God, and all the honour will be referred to him; his absolute kingdom shall then supersede the Mediatorial kingdom of Christ, that God may be acknowledged and glorified, as "all in all," the first great Cause, and the last End, in every thing, and the Object of universal adoration and obedience. The distinction between the absolute, universal, and everlasting kingdom of God, the h 16. 32. Matt. xx 22.

29 Else [h] what shall they do which are baptized for the dead, if the dead rise not at all? why are they then baptized for the dead?

Governor of all, and the mediatorial kingdom of Christ, as instituted for the benefit of fallen man, is every where implied in Scripture. The Father, as the Head of the absolute kingdom, ceased not to reign when the Son was advanced to the mediatorial throne, as that authority was only intended to endure for a time, in order to accomplish certain important ends, to the glory of God in man's salvation. After the day of judgment, this kingdom will be terminated; Christ, having executed his commission, will cease to reign over all worlds as mediator, having publicly delivered up the kingdom to God in the person of the Father, yet he will, in human nature, retain a peculiar authority over his redeemed people; and, as One with the Father, he will, with him and the Holy Spirit, reign One "God over all, blessed for evermore;" nor will he any more cease to reign, in this sense, when he hath given up the mediatorial kingdom, than the Father ceased to reign when he appointed the Son to that kingdom. For in this passage, as in some others, the Person of the Father is mentioned, as filling the throne, and appointing the Mediator, in order to distinguish that absolute authority of God from the delegated authority of the Son in human nature. 'He saith not that "the Father," 'mentioned in 'the twenty-fourth verse, but that "God may be all in "all;" 'and so he seems to lead us to that interpretation 'of the Godhead, which comprehends Father, Son, and 'Holy Ghost. That the Godhead may govern all things 'immediately by himself, without the intervention of a 'Mediator between him and us, to exact our obedience 'in his name, and to convey to us his favours and rewards. '—So as now Christ, God-man, is "all in all," (Col. iii. 11.) 'because the Father hath put all things into his 'hand, does all things, and governs all things, by him; 'when this œconomy ceases, the Godhead will be "all in "all," 'as governing and influencing all things by him'self immediately.' "That God may be all in all," 'by a full communication of himself to, and an inti'mate union with, all his saints.' 'As the priesthood of 'Christ must needs cease, when the subject of it ceaseth, 'and he hath none to intercede for, so must his kingly of'fice cease, when all his friends have that eternal life con'ferred upon them, for which this power was given to 'him, and all his enemies are become his footstool.'—'The Godhead could alone enable him to execute his 'kingly office, yet this power was conferred on him, "because he was the Son of man." 'He intercedeth still 'in heaven, by virtue of his blood; all favours are granted 'to the Church through him, and "God will judge the "world by the Man Christ Jesus." 'While he conti'nued on earth, and acted only as a Prophet sent from God, 'he always owned that he could "do nothing of himself, "but as the Father gave him commandment, so he did, "and so he spake." 'But being exalted to be Lord of all 'things, he acted as a Lord in all things, which relate to 'his kingly office over his Church. The exercise of this 'authority he shall then lay down, when "all things are "subdued to him;" 'no other kingdom or dominion be'ing to be exercised in the celestial state, but what is es'sential to the Godhead. And though he shall ever so 'far reign, as to be still at the right hand of God, in ho'nour, dignity, and beatitude, and though the effects of 'his kingly power shall continue for ever, yet the exer'cise of that power shall then cease, and he, as Man, 'shall be subject to the Father.' 'As Christ before was "all in all," 'in reference to his Church, and "from his "fulness they did all receive," so now the Godhead may 'be all in all, and fill all things immediately by himself.' (Whitby.) No doubt Christ, as Man, and in his mediatorial kingdom, always was most perfectly subject to the Godhead, referring all to his honour, and exercising all his authority, "to the glory of God the Father;" but when the grand designs of that kingdom shall be illustriously completed, in the view of all holy creatures in the universe, and the kingdom delivered up, this shall appear in the most conspicuous manner, and so as far to exceed all our conceptions, and the glory of the Godhead, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, will be displayed and adored, in the highest possible degree.

V. 29. The apostle, having shown the order and event of the general resurrection, proceeds to evince still further the importance of a firm belief of it. The expression, "baptized for the dead," has given occasion to a variety of ingenious conjectures, and learned discussions. Some argue that it only means 'baptized in the name of one 'who certainly died,' and who, "if the dead rise not," 'still remains among the dead;' but the word rendered dead is plural, and all the labour bestowed to remove that difficulty appears to be altogether in vain. Others suppose that the apostle refers to a practice, which it seems at one time prevailed in the Church, of baptizing a living person in the stead, and for the supposed benefit, of one who had died unbaptized. But who can imagine, that so absurd and gross a superstition was customary when the apostle wrote? Or that he should sanction it? Beza, rather triumphantly, concludes that he has discovered and fixed the true interpretation; and that the apostle meant the washing of the dead bodies among the Jews, and Christians, before burial, (Acts ix. 37;) which he thinks was a profession that they expected a resurrection. But this use of the word baptize, in such a connexion, could hardly be expected; and the words will not bear that sense by any fair interpretation. Hammond contends, that it means the profession of faith, concerning the resurrection of the dead, which was required of persons at their baptism, which represented, as he thinks, the burial and resurrection of Christ. Why did they profess this, if they did not believe it? But this is far from satisfactory: for the peculiar circumstances of some persons, when they were baptized, seem evidently intended. 'What this bap'tizing for the dead was, I confess I know not, but it 'seems by the following verses, to be something wherein 'they exposed themselves to the danger of death' (Locke.) The following interpretation, however, suggested by Dr. Doddridge, who received it from Sir Richard Ellis, appears the true one. The apostle refers to the case of those who presented themselves for baptism, immediately after the martyrdom of their brethren, or at their funerals; as if fresh soldiers should enlist and press forward to the assault, to supply the places of those who had fallen in battle. Thus they professed their faith in Christ, and ventured the rage of their enemies, at the very time when others had been put to death for the Gospel. But what advantage could they propose to themselves from such a conduct, if there were no resurrection? Or what wisdom could there be in so doing? For in this case, Christianity itself would lose the great evidence of its truth; even the immortality of the soul might be called in question; believers were yet in their sins; and they, who had died as martyrs, had lost their souls, as well as their lives! This might show the Corinthians how greatly their sentiment tended to discourage men from professing the Gospel, in times of persecution, and to make them afraid and ashamed to own the cause of Christ. If this were the case, why did Christians in general, or the apostles and evangelists in particular, live in continual and urgent danger of suffering and death, by their open profession of the Gospel and their zeal in promoting it? They could have no sufficient encouragement for so doing, if the dead arose not.

V. 30—32. The apostle could protest in the most solemn manner, "by their rejoicing," or his rejoicing with them, and on their account, as converted by his ministry; (several copies read it "our rejoicing;") that he "died daily;" he was every day exposed to the peril of martyrdom; he expected that violent death continually, and his manifold hardships and sufferings rendered his life a kind of lingering execution. To all this he had nothing to oppose, but the joyful hope and blessed earnests of future felicity, through his crucified and risen Lord; and the pleasure of bringing others to share the same salvation, which, upon the principles that he was confuting, must prove a mere delusion. What profit then could he derive from his late perils at Ephesus, if the dead should not arise? he had there, "after the manner of men, fought "with wild beasts." It is not probable that the apostle literally fought with wild beasts in the public shows; such an event could scarcely have been passed over unnoticed by Luke in the Acts of the Apostles; as a Roman citizen, it cannot be supposed that he would have been exposed to such an indignity, and the expression, "after "the manner of men," favours the figurative interpretation. But the irrational fury of his enraged enemies, with the extreme danger to which he was exposed, might very properly be represented as a contest with savage beasts of prey. Many expositors have supposed that the apostle referred to the tumult at Ephesus, excited by Demetrius and his workmen; but he afterwards expresses his purpose of continuing at Ephesus till Pentecost; (xvi. 8.) whereas in the history it is said, that "after the uproar "ceased, he departed to go into Macedonia." (Acts xx, 1.) Indeed his whole plan seems to have been deranged, in good measure, by that tumult. (Notes, xvi. 9, 10. 2 Cor. i. 8—14.) Had he, in this short and figurative expression, alluded to that event, in writing to the Corinthians, it must have been as supposing them previously acquainted with it. It is evident, that he wrote from Ephesus, and that he intended to remain there for some time. The epistle must therefore have been written before that tumult, and some other of his perils and hardships at Ephesus must be meant. He had great success and many adversaries in that city; and it is plain, that but a small part of his sufferings have been particularly recorded. (Note, 2 Cor. xi. 21—31.) 'If this sense,' (the literal interpretation,) 'be not liked, you may interpret "after "the manner of men," 'according to the intention of men, 'it being the intention of the men of Asia, to deal so 'with him. Note also, that cruel and bloody-minded 'men are often represented under this metaphor of beasts. 'So Ignatius, when he was carried from Syria to Rome 'under a band of soldiers,' (who, saith he, are the worse for the kindness I show them,) 'From Syria to Rome I 'fight with beasts. And Heraclitus says, The Ephesians 'were turned into beasts, because they slew one another.' (Whitby.)

V. 33, 34. The apostle's conduct in steadfastly persevering to profess and preach the Gospel, abundantly demonstrated that he most firmly believed a future resurrection, with which all his hopes and comforts were inseparably connected. Whereas, the epicurean maxim, "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die," let us indulge every sense and appetite without restraint, and shrink from all hardship as much as possible, for death will soon terminate our pleasures, and nothing further is to be expected, would be the natural inference from a denial of that doctrine, when carried to its unavoidable consequences. Let none then be deceived by the specious reasonings and pretences of their false teachers; for even a heathen poet, (Menander,) could teach them, that "evil "communications," or the familiar converse of those who inculcated false and pernicious principles, would "corrupt their good manners," and tend to self-indulgence, an undue regard to present ease, interest, or reputation, and a disposition to neglect their duty, conceal their sentiments, and avoid suffering for Christ's sake. Indeed, they had already produced these effects in many instances, and were diffusing their baleful influence. The apostle must therefore call upon them to "awake righteously," (in a righteous manner,) and as became righteous persons, from the lethargy into which these delusions had thrown them; for, whilst they were elated with an opinion of their superior knowledge, it was evident that some among them had not the humbling, sanctifying, and saving knowledge of God; and their communications corrupted the good manners of the rest. This must be spoken to their shame, and it behooved them to be humbled for it, and ashamed of it, as far better things might have been expected from them, considering the opportunities which they had enjoyed, and the profession which they had made. It is evident, that the apostle constantly aimed to bring the Corinthians to a more humble opinion of themselves, and gradually to draw them off from their false teachers.

V. 35—38. The philosophizing skeptics, concerning the resurrection, were ready, (as the apostle well knew,) to inquire in what manner the dead could be raised, after their bodies had been turned to dust, mixed with other substances, and even become a part of their bodies? And, if this were possible, with what bodies, or what sort of bodies, would they come forth from the graves? With such as they had on earth? or with others of a different form and constitution? Such an inquirer the apostle addressed as a foolish and ignorant man, who pretended to limit omnipotency, and to deny the possibility of an event, because he could not solve all difficulties about it, and comprehend in what manner it could take place. Even the ordinary productions of the earth exhibited a process, which might illustrate the subject; for the seed sown in the ground does not vegetate, except it corrupt and die. Some modern infidels have maintained, against the apostle, that the seed does not die in vegetation; because the germen lives, and expands itself, and only the extraneous matter corrupts. But in fact, the seed, as such, doth die; it ceases to be a grain of corn, though a part of it springs, as it were, into new life, by a process which we can no more fully comprehend, than we can the manner of the resurrection. Even a "prophet of their own," Lucretius, the epicurean atheist, says,—'Whatever change 'transfers a body into a new class of beings, may be 'justly called the death of the original substance. For 'what is changed from what it was, that dies.' (Creech.) The body sown is not the same which will exist, when it hath sprung up and produced the full corn in the ear, but a bare grain of wheat, barley, or other corn. This, (after corrupting in the earth,) by the wonderful power of God, springs up and produces an increase, and he gives that increase a body, as it pleaseth him. Yet, whatever else is changed, he always gives every seed its own body, and so preserves a complete distinction between the different kinds of vegetable productions. (Note, John xii. 24.) Thus the bodies of believers, after corrupting and turning to dust, will be raised in a new and more glorious form; not in every respect the same that they were, but one far superior and more excellent. This will be done in the infinite wisdom, according to the sovereign will, and by the almighty power of God, but in a manner inexplicable to us. The identity of the same particles of matter, as necessary to the resurrection of the same body, is no where mentioned in Scripture; and this chapter seems to militate against such an opinion. God hath many other ways of preserving personal identity; exactly the same particles do not constitute our bodies for two hours together in any part of our lives; yet we are the same persons, both in body and soul, from childhood to old age. So that there is no need to clog the doctrine with this opinion, which furnishes infidels with their most specious objections against it. Many of the philosophers, and afterwards of the heretics, considered the body as the prison and sepulchre of the soul; from which it would at death be delivered. Such men indeed could not but dislike the doctrine of the resurrection, and be disposed to dispute against it; yet the passage does not seem to refer to objectors of this kind.

V. 39—44. The reference is here made to the variety, as well as the wonderful nature, of the works of God, in order to raise our conceptions, so as to silence all thoughts of the difficulties which seem to stand in the way. The flesh of different animals, as well as the form of vegetables, is differently constituted, produced, and supported; yet we cannot comprehend the manner in which the Creator hath made and preserves this difference; though it is evidently intended to fit them for their several kinds of life, their diverse elements, nutriment, and uses. Cannot he man Adam, was made a living soul, the last Adam was made [n] a quickening Spirit.

then raise our bodies suited to the state intended for them, consistently with our personal identity, and in a manner inexplicable to us? The same varied wisdom and power of God hath formed celestial, as well as terrestrial bodies, but the celestial appear far more splendid than the terrestrial: yet even among the former there are different degrees of glory, as they are in themselves, or as they appear to us. The sun is far more glorious than the moon; yet the reflected light of the moon far exceeds that of the remote stars, and some of them shine more bright than others. Thus also will it be in the resurrection of the dead; the bodies of the righteous will appear as much more glorious than they now do, as the heavenly luminaries excel a clod of the earth, yet will they shine with different degrees of splendour, as the sun, moon, and stars do. The body, as born of dying Adam's race, and during its mortal state, and as laid in the grave, "is sown in "corruption," it tends to corruption, and after death it is speedily wasted and decayed: but at the resurrection it will be raised in incorruption, without any seeds of mortality, disease, or decay, in its constitution, but fitted for a state of perfect health, vigour, and activity, to all eternity. Here, during life, at death, and in the grave, the body is sown in dishonour; it lives as a condemned criminal; various sufferings and diseases are the forerunners of the execution which takes place at death, with much ignominy and disgrace: and the wasting state of a dead corpse is very dishonourable in itself, though the death and burial of Christ has sanctified the grave to all believers, and his resurrection hath assured us that the body shall be raised in glory. But the triumph over death and the grave will be honourable; the body will be rendered most beautiful and glorious, it will be made fit for that heavenly felicity, and those employments in which angels are associated, and it will resemble the glorious body of the Lord Jesus himself, the First-born from the dead. "It is also sown "in weakness;" our manifold diseases, and death in which they terminate, are peculiar evidences of human imbecility; and the state of the body in the ground, devoured by worms, a loathsome object and turning to the dust, shows most affectingly how little all men's power and abilities can do for them. But the body of a believer will not only be raised by almighty power; it will also be endued with a power of which we have no conception, and be rendered capable of such motions, and of producing such effects, as utterly surpass whatever we have heard, seen, or perhaps imagined. In short, the body is here sown a natural, or an animal, body; it resembles the bodies of animals, in its wants, appetites, pains, and diseases, and after death it turns to dust, as they do; but hereafter it will be raised a spiritual body, capable of the spiritual work, worship, and happiness of heaven; entirely refined from all its sensual dross and low desires; needing no more food, rest, sleep, or recreation; no longer capable of relishing animal pleasures; and no more a clog to the soul, but a helper to it, in all holy exercises. For there is a natural body suited to our state on earth, and a spiritual body suited to the heavenly state; nor can these be in every respect the same. (Note, Luke xx. 34—36.)

V. 45—49. In the history of the creation it was written, that "the first man, Adam, was made a living "soul:" and his natural or animal life had been communicated to all his posterity, but without the spiritual life originally connected with it; so that, ever since the fall, the very mind of man had been carnal, as well as his body mortal. (Note, Gen. ii. 7.) But "the last Adam," the latter Surety, or Covenant-head, of any of the human race, "was a quickening Spirit:" the Author and Source of spiritual and eternal life to all his people, by the supply of his holy Spirit. Nor does this quickening energy relate only to their souls; for he will also "quicken their mortal "bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in them;" and this is here principally intended. But the natural and carnal state, in both cases, preceded the spiritual: we are born in sin, bearing the image of the first Adam; and are afterwards born again to bear the image of the second Adam; the soul continuing numerically and identically the same, though newly created. In like manner, we first have a natural and mortal body like that of Adam, and at length we shall have an incorruptible and spiritual body like that of Christ: yet it will be in one sense the same body, equally ours, though in another sense it will be changed. The first man was formed of the dust of the earth, and was earthy in his nature and original: but the second Man, to whom all believers are united and conformed, "is the "Lord from heaven," the Lord of glory, Jehovah, God in human nature. As long as we are conformed to the earthy Adam, which, in respect of our bodies, will be till the resurrection, we are earthy; our bodies, during life, are gross, animal, and diseased; and, after death, they turn to the dust whence they were taken. But when we shall be conformed to the heavenly Adam, our bodies will become heavenly, and suited to that spiritual and immortal felicity, to which we shall be admitted. Even the apostle and all Christians had borne the image of the earthy Adam; but they were assured, by the promise of God, that they should at length bear the image of the heavenly Adam; not only in their souls, but in their bodies also, which would be raised very different in their appearance and capacities from what they were when on earth; and thus all 50 Now [u] this I say, brethren, [x] that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; neither doth corruption inherit incorruption.

51 Behold, [y] I shew you a mystery; [z] We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be [a] changed, 52 In [b] a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the [c] last trump: [d] for the trumpet shall sound, [e] and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed.

53 For this corruptible must [f] put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality.

54 So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and [g] this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, [h] Death is swallowed up in victory.

55 [i] O death, where is thy [k] sting? O [*] grave, where [l] is thy victory?

56 The [m] sting of death is sin; and [n] the strength of sin is the law;

57 But [o] thanks be to God, which [p] giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ.

58 [q] Therefore, my beloved brethren, [r] be ye steadfast, unmoveable, always [s] abounding in [t] the work of the Lord, forasmuch as [u] ye know that your labour [x] is not in vain [y] in the Lord.

philosophical objections were shown to have their foundation in ignorance of the Scriptures, and of the power of God. (Note, Matt. xxii. 29, 30.)

V. 50—54. A similar change must also be made in the bodies of those who shall be found alive at the day of judgment: for flesh and blood, the human body in its present form and gross manner of subsistence, and with its present animal wants, propensities, and infirmities, cannot inherit the kingdom of God, or partake of its pure and refined pleasures: nor can corruption, or the body as mortal and corruptible, inherit incorruption, or the incorruptible and unchangeable felicity of heaven. The apostle therefore declared to the Corinthians a mystery, which could not be known except by immediate revelation, or understood except by faith receiving that revelation. Speaking of the whole multitude of believers to the end of time, as constituting one family, to which he and the Corinthians belonged, he might say, "We shall not all sleep," or die, "but we shall all be changed." But he elsewhere speaks of himself, as one of those who should be "raised up by "Jesus," (2 Cor. iv. 14.) So that there can be no ground for the supposition, which many have formed from his language, that he expected to live till the coming of Christ, which he judged to be very near: and the notion of others, that he alluded to the first resurrection previous to the millennium, is inconsistent with the language of the passage: for they, who have died, (or shall die before the millennium,) as truly "sleep in Jesus," though they should arise immediately, as they do who shall remain in the state of the dead till the general resurrection. The apostle therefore only meant to speak of himself as belonging to that one family, of whom most would die and be raised again, and all must one way or other be changed. This change will be effected in a moment, instantaneously, as the eye twinkles, by the almighty power of Christ, when the last trumpet shall sound, as the summons to all men to meet their Judge. (Marg. Ref.) Then the voice of Christ will be heard by all the dead, and they will be raised again to life in their own order; and then the bodies of living believers will be changed from natural to spiritual, from corruptible to incorruptible, from mortal to immortal; even as a man's form is changed by putting on new raiment. When this change hath taken place, in respect of all believers; then the saying of the prophet will finally be accomplished. (Notes, Is. xxv. 6—8.) Death and all his power shall be annihilated, and swallowed up for ever, in the complete victory obtained over him by Christ and his people; and sin, with all its consequences, shall ever after be wholly confined to the place "prepared for the devil and his angels." The apostle showed the Corinthians a mystery, by informing them of the event that would take place; yet, in respect to the manner in which it would be effected, it still remained mysterious and incomprehensible. Thus the mysteries of the Trinity, and of the incarnation of "the Lord from "heaven," are revealed to us, as certainly true, but the manner of them still remains inexplicable.

V. 55—58. With the glorious prospect before the eyes of his faith and hope, the apostle, in the most beautiful and animated apostrophe, addressed death and the grave, or the unseen world, as real persons, the universal and most terrible conquerors and oppressors of the human race. He demanded of death, where was now his sting, or his destructive dart or spear, with which he had caused such anguish and terror, and wrought such wide-spread desolations. And of the grave, what was now become of his victory, by which he seemed to have shut up in his dark dungeon, as vanquished foes, all the generations of men that had lived on earth. Indeed, the sin of man was the sting and destructive weapon of death, which both enabled him to kill the body, and had made that fatal stroke tremendous: and the holy law, pronouncing the sentence of condemnation against every transgressor, gave sin its power to bring death upon mankind, and to embitter its agonies with the dread of future punishment. This was the natural and universal state of man; and all must have thus lived, died, and perished miserably, had not God provided deliverance for them. But Christians might now return thanks to him with joyful hearts, for having given them the victory over these dreadful foes by Jesus Christ, through his vicarious sufferings and glorious resurrection; and for bringing them to this faith and hope in him. They might therefore at present triumph over the fear of death, in confidence of a glorious resurrection for their bodies, as well as of immediate and eternal happiness for their souls; and they would all at length most certainly triumph in the full possession of those blessings, and in a complete victory over these enemies. He therefore exhorted his beloved brethren, to continue steadfast in the profession and faith of the Gospel, and immoveable in their adherence to the truth and will of God, amidst all dangers and temptations: and especially to continue steadfast and unmoveable in the belief of the resurrection, notwithstanding the artifices of false teachers. At the same time, let them abound in all those good works, which the commandment and honour of their Lord required, from love to his name, his cause, and his people: seeing that they had the fullest assurances, that their labour "in the "Lord," or from such motives as his Gospel suggested, and especially from love to the Lord Jesus, and zeal for his honour, would by no means be in vain, either unrewarded or unsuccessful; but that the whole of it would terminate in his glory, the good of mankind, and their own everlasting advantage. Every part of this animated discourse shows, that the resurrection of true believers is exclusively intended: for the things spoken will not be fulfilled, either in respect of the dead, or of those who may live when Christ shall come to judgment, in any others, by whatever name, form, or creed, they are distinguished.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

When the faithful minister sees his beloved people drawn aside to embrace dangerous errors; his chief comfort under the trial must arise from being able to appeal to them, that the doctrine which he preached was Scriptural; and from a full satisfaction, that they who had received it and stand fast in it will be certainly saved: and that none of them can perish, if they keep in remembrance the instructions he gave them; unless they deceived themselves with a vain, a dead, and inefficient faith. In order that we may possess this comfort, we must be careful to deliver the truths of God's word pure, as we have received them; and in that order and proportion in which they stand in the Scriptures: and he who attends to these sacred oracles, will know assuredly, that the death of Christ for our sins, and his resurrection for our justification, are essential and fundamental truths, which must, in all places and on all occasions, be explicitly and strenuously insisted on. Apostles and prophets concur in bearing testimony to them, even more than to many other truths: and, blessed be God, the demonstration of our Lord's resurrection is equal to the weight, which is to be supported by that important fact. (Notes, John xx.) The most eminent Christians are always the most humble: they continually reflect on the aggravated sins of their unconverted state; especially if they were long or greatly set in opposition to the Gospel. The more evidently God hath pardoned them, the less disposed will they be to excuse themselves. They feel their unworthiness of the distinctions conferred on them; they are disposed in honour to prefer others to themselves: and, though they cannot but be conscious of what the Lord hath done for and by them; yet, taking their whole conduct and obligations together, they readily conclude, that none are so unfruitful and unprofitable as they. In reality, it is a great thing for a man with propriety, humility, and truth, to say, "By the grace of "God, I am what I am:" the declaration only becomes those who are walking under the influence of holy principles; and is utterly unsuitable to the character of the loose, or formal, professor. But if we really fear and love the Lord, and walk in his ways, we must ascribe all the glory to his grace and mercy: if much have been forgiven us, we should pray to be enabled to love much: if our conversion have been remarkable, we should earnestly desire, that the grace bestowed on us may not be in vain: if we have set out late in life to serve the Lord; we should aim to redeem the time that hath been lost, by labouring more abundantly than our brethren: and, while we charge all our sins and follies upon ourselves, we must remember to ascribe all the good which we do to the grace of God that is with us.

V. 12—19.

How subtilly doth Satan bring in false doctrines, by men of abilities, learning, or eloquence; in a covert and plausible manner, that the simple may suspect no danger! Such teachers, with apparent modesty, question whether we have rightly understood the sacred writers; and whether the doctrine, that they oppose, be contained in them. They inquire, whether a more rational interpretation may not be given to such and such texts? Whether the more obvious meaning do not involve absurdity, or even impossibility? Whether any but the weak and illiterate can credit such mysteries? And whether we had not better adopt a figurative sense, or admit some other reading, or even suppose the sacred writer to be mistaken; than assent to so incomprehensible, and therefore irrational a doctrine? If indeed they could prove the mysteries which they oppose to be contrary to fact, to intuition, or to demonstration, their principles might be admitted: but when they apply them to doctrines, which are merely above reason, and contrary to their supposed probabilities and vain reasonings; they are perfectly inadmissible and irrational, unless man be wiser than his Maker. But the dupes of such specious pretences are seldom aware, whither these rational improvements of the creed and of the Scriptures tend: they do not perceive, that according to them man's presumptuous reason sits in horts them to vigilance, steadfastness, and love, 13, 14; recommends the household of Stephanas to their special regard, 15, 16; expresses his satisfaction at the coming of certain persons from Corinth, 17, 18; and, after salutations from the Churches, concludes in the most solemn and affectionate manner, 19—24.

judgment on the infinite wisdom of God; man's weakness is made the standard of omnipotence; and man's vain conjecture the measure of divine revelation! Indeed, this is perfectly consistent with those œconomical and political sentiments, contended by the same oracles of an enlightened age; by which children are set to judge, whether their parents are fit to be honoured and obeyed, or not: servants are called on to determine the same concerning their masters: and, in short, not only is all subordination virtually destroyed, but in every relation the inferior is constituted the judge of his superiors, without any appeal from his arrogant tribunal! In like manner, the principles before cited, when fairly examined, are found to involve consequences, subversive of those truths which are professedly venerated; to invalidate the testimony of Scripture, and to tend to universal skepticism: they prove, (if they prove any thing,) that the preaching of the apostles and the faith of primitive believers were vain; and that the martyrs for the Gospel were false witnesses against God, by testifying truths and facts, which remote posterity has found out to be false or needless! This is especially the case, in respect of those doctrines that relate to the Person, undertaking, and atonement of Christ, and the way of acceptance by faith in him. If Christ had not risen, his sacrifice could not have been depended on, because there could be no proof that it was accepted; and consequently believers must still have been in their sins; they who slept in this faith must have perished; the preachers of the Gospel must either have been deceivers, or deceived; and the disciples, having only hope in Christ as to this present world, must have been of all men most miserable! To what, then, must the tenets lead, of those, who indeed profess to believe that Christ is risen, yet deny, explain away, or overlook, that great doctrine, which he especially rose again to establish and demonstrate?

V. 20—28.

We have full proof, that Christ both died for our sins, and rose again from the dead for our justification, and as the First-fruits of our resurrection; that, as death entered by man, so might life eternal be introduced by One in our nature. We certainly know that all in Adam die; and it is equally sure that all in Christ shall arise to immortal glory. Undoubtedly, the suffering, dying, risen, and ascended Saviour will soon appear, to raise the dead and judge the world: may we be found among "those, "that are Christ's at his coming!" It should be with us a matter of serious inquiry, whether we are his true disciples or not? For soon the end will come; the mediatorial kingdom will be delivered up to God, even the Father; and all who shall then be found enemies will be put under Christ's feet, and be punished with everlasting destruction. Would we then triumph in that solemn and important season, we must now submit to his rule, accept of his salvation, and live to the glory of God through him. Then shall we at length rejoice in all his victories, and participate his glories; we shall exult, with immense satisfaction, in the blessed accomplishment of the Redeemer's undertaking; and as being with him, our Head in human nature, put under the absolute dominion of our reconciled Father, "that God may be all in all," that he may receive the whole glory of our salvation, and that we may for ever serve him and enjoy his favour, without sin or death, and without needing repentance, forgiveness, a sacrifice, or a Mediator any more, to all eternity.

V. 29—32.

Should we lose sight of the animating prospect, in the preceding verses set before us, should any one prevail to argue us out of these our expectations, how must our zeal, diligence, and boldness, be enervated, and our rejoicing damped! Who then would step forward to succeed those illustrious soldiers of Christ, who have nobly bled in the cause of truth? Who would confess him in this evil world? Why should we stand in jeopardy continually? Why should we venture the rage of men, more savage than lions and tigers, more venomous than serpents, and more subtle than foxes? Such principles would soon induce us to depart from our constancy, and make us exclaim, "What advantageth it us, if the dead rise not?" or even tempt us to say, "Let us eat and drink, for to-"morrow we die." Let us not then suffer ourselves to be deceived by corrupt reasoners; but let us separate from them, and venture our all, on the single testimony of the word of "God, who cannot lie." Let us fear associating with skeptical, profligate, or ungodly men; for "evil "communications corrupt good manners;" let us warn our children, our juniors, our hearers, to shun them as a pestilence; let us awake to righteousness, and not sin; let us not hearken to those who know not God, in what science else they may excel; being assured that this ignorance will be found shameful, in proportion to the abilities, opportunities, confidence, or profession, of those in whom it is found.

V. 33—41.

If any are still disposed to start objections, or make presumptuous inquiries, when truths are scripturally proposed, let them remember the appellation, which the apostle, or rather the Holy Spirit, gives to such wise men of this world. For they may thence learn, that man's wisdom consists in becoming a little child, and simply believing his Maker. The works of creation and providence read us daily lectures of humility, as well as teach us to admire the variety of the great Creator's wisdom and goodness. Till we can fully comprehend the whole process, by which a bare grain, corrupting in the earth, produces many ears of corn at the harvest, and till we can satisfactorily answer all questions, and solve all difficulties about it, let us learn to be the pupils, and not assume to be the counsellors of the most High: and let us hold fast the sure hope of a glorious resurrection; without perplexing ourselves about the manner, in which infinite wisdom and almighty power can effect it.

V. 42--58.

They who shall be accounted worthy to obtain felicity in the heavenly state will excel in glory all present splendours, far more than the celestial bodies transcend the terrestrial: and yet they shall exceed one another in glory, as one star differeth from another; while Christ, the Sun of Righteousness, shall infinitely outshine them all. This degraded, corruptible, sinful, and dying body, shall be raised incorruptible, immortal, and glorious; it shall become vigorous, active, and beautiful, beyond conception; this animal body shall be raised spiritual. Here our very souls are carnal, there our very bodies will be spiritual. And our "second Adam, the Lord from heaven," will give new and immortal life, as "a quickening Spirit," both to our souls and bodies; that in both, according to our measure, we may bear his image and glorify his name. As flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of heaven, let us then not "sow to the flesh, of which we can only "reap corruption:" and as they who shall be exempted from death must be changed, let this reconcile our minds to that change, which death will begin, and the resurrection complete in our bodies; when death shall be swallowed up in victory. Let us then seek the full assurance of faith and hope, that in the midst of pain, and in the prospect of dissolution, we may triumphantly exclaim, "O death, where "is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?" That we may hail the sharpest pangs of dying, and think without emotion on the darkness, the corruption, and the horrors of the tomb, assured, that there our bodies will sleep at ease; that in the mean time our souls will be present with our beloved Redeemer; and that our bodies will shortly arise, to share that unspeakable felicity. But "sin is the "sting of death," and who can disarm that "king of ter"rors?" For "the law is the strength of sin;" and who can answer its demands, endure its curse, or expiate his own transgressions? Hence the terror and the anguish; hence the wretched cleave to life; save when infidelity, despair, and rebellion, induce madness and suicide! Hence, death is justly terrible to the unbelieving and impenitent; hence, the needless alarms of the weak and trembling believer. Thanks be to God, that there is deliverance and victory for us in Christ Jesus! May he give us faith and hope, and increase our faith and hope, that we may not only be safe, but joyful and triumphant! And, having these assurances, let "us be steadfast, unmoveable, always "abounding in the work of the Lord, as knowing that our "labour is not in vain in the Lord."

NOTES.

CHAP. XVI. V. 1, 2. The Corinthians seem to have been previously acquainted with the apostle's intention of raising a contribution from the Gentile Churches, for the poor Christians in Judea; and, as they were more wealthy than most of their brethren, he did not intimate a doubt of their liberality in that good work: but he deemed it proper to point out to them the method, which he had given orders for in the Churches of Galatia, whence he had lately come. On the first day of the week, let every man treasure up a proportion of his gains, according as God had prospered him during the preceding week: thus a larger sum would gradually be provided, than could at once have been collected. Some are of opinion, that the sums thus set apart were brought to the treasury of the Church at the same time: but the words do not seem to admit of that interpretation; and if each separately laid by the sum which he purposed to give, the whole would be brought together, at once, when necessary, without any trouble in soliciting contributions. Laying it up as a treasure. 'For 'these are the true riches, laid up in heaven, intrusted to 'God, to be compensated with the amplest interest, both 'in this world and the next, though not of their own va'lue, but of his mere liberality.' (Beza.) Worldly men would, at certain times, increase their treasure, by adding their clear gains to it; let Christians imitate them, by laying up on the Lord's day for their poor and distressed brethren, according as God had prospered them, and count this their treasure. If this was kept apart by each person till wanted, so that none knew what others gave, ostentation and corrupt emulation would be far more effectually excluded, than if each brought his contribution to the common stock every week, and so a public account was taken of it. It was especially needful, that this precaution should be taken at Corinth, where these evils exceedingly prevailed: and it is evident that the apostle intended, as much as possible, to leave every one, in this respect, to determine for himself, before God, what he ought to do; that none might give more than he could properly spare, or than he was from proper motives inclined to, either to acquire applause, or to escape censure and contempt. (Notes, 2 Cor. viii. 1—15.) The argument from this passage, for the observance of the first day of the week as the Lord's day, the Christian sabbath, is very conclusive: for, unless that were the custom in apostolical Churches, why should the first day of the week be mentioned in this connexion? 'On Sunday,' says Justin Martyr, 'all Christians, in the 'city or country, meet together, because that is the day of 'our Lord's resurrection: and then we read the writings 'of the prophets and apostles. This being done, the presi'dent makes an oration to the assembly, exhorting them to 'imitate and do the things which they have heard; then 'we all join in prayer, and after that we celebrate the 'sacrament.' (Whitby.)

4 And [i] if it be meet that I go also, they shall go with me.

5 Now I will come unto you, [k] when I shall pass through Macedonia: for I do pass through Macedonia:

6 And it may be that I will abide, yea, [l] and winter with you, [m] that ye may bring me on my journey whithersoever I go.

7 For I will not see you now by the way; but I trust to tarry a while with you, [n] if the Lord permit.

8 But I will tarry [o] at Ephesus until [p] Pentecost.

9 For [q] a great [r] door and effectual is opened unto me, [s] and there are many adversaries.

10 Now [t] if Timotheus come, see that he may be with you [u] without fear: [x] for he worketh the work of the Lord, as I also do.

11 Let [y] no man therefore despise him; [z] but conduct him forth in peace, that he may come unto me: for I look for him with the brethren.

12 As touching [a] our brother Apollos, I greatly desired him to come unto you with the brethren: but his will was not at all to come at this time; but he will come [b] when he shall have convenient time.

V. 3, 4. Every thing having been previously arranged, the apostle, when he arrived at Corinth, would send with the bounty of the Corinthians such persons as they approved, and would recommend by their letters. Or rather, joining the words, "by letters," with the latter clause, whomsoever they approved, the apostle would send with a letter from him to the apostles and elders at Jerusalem: or if it was thought more satisfactory to all concerned, he would himself accompany the messengers.

V. 5—9. The apostle was meditating to make a progress through Macedonia when he wrote this epistle: and he seems to have given some intimations, that he would go to Corinth in his way to Macedonia, as well as on his return, though it is not here mentioned. (2 Cor. i. 15.) He had, however, formed his determination of coming; and he assured the Corinthians that he would make some stay among them, if the Lord would give him leave: for he did not think it sufficient merely to call on them as a traveller in his journey, when so many things required his presence among them. His plan therefore was, to tarry at Ephesus till the feast of Pentecost; the rest of the summer he meant to employ in his progress through Macedonia, and then perhaps to spend the winter with them; expecting that afterwards they would help him forward in his journey, whithersoever he purposed to go. He might intend to sail from Ephesus to Corinth first; then after a short stay, to go into Macedonia, and afterwards return to winter there. But he deemed it incumbent on him to continue some time longer at Ephesus, as great opportunities of service were afforded him, great success attended his labours, and many adversaries were excited to oppose him, to terrify or dissuade men from embracing the Gospel, or to discourage and mislead the new converts. His presence therefore was peculiarly necessary, though his dangers and hardships were proportionably increased. It is evident, from the concluding salutation, that the apostle wrote this epistle from Ephesus, though the spurious addition at the close dates it from Philippi. It is probable that the tumult made at Ephesus by Demetrius hastened the apostle's departure; and his plan seems in other respects to have been circumstantially deranged. Pentecost. 'It therefore was the following Pentecost, that he hastened to be at Jerusalem.' (Whitby.)

V. 10, 11. Timothy had been sent before the apostle into Macedonia, with directions to visit Corinth, (iv. 17. Acts xix. 22:) but such was the disposition of many in that city, that it was necessary to charge them not to behave improperly to him when he came. For the apostle was apprehensive, that their party-quarrels and opposition to his authority would induce them to show such dislike and contempt of Timothy, as to make him afraid of executing his commission among them. He therefore assured them, that Timothy was faithful and skilful in the work of the Lord, even as he was: let none of them therefore despise him, because of his youth, or his supposed deficiency in "the wisdom of words and excellency of speech:" let them encourage and countenance him, in bearing testimony against the abuses which had taken place among them: let them not take offence at his faithfulness, or permit him to go away, as one who had incurred their displeasure: but let them conduct him forth in peace and love, on his journey towards Ephesus, where the apostle expected him, with the brethren that accompanied him; or both he and the brethren at Ephesus expected him, as one whom they greatly loved. Probably, Timothy returned to Ephesus before Paul was driven thence. 'We infer that Timothy 'was not sent with the epistle; for had he been the bearer 'of the letter, would St. Paul in that letter have said, "if "Timothy come?" 'If he was with the apostle when he 'wrote the letter, could he say, "I look for him with the "brethren?" 'Timothy was sent forth upon his journey 'before the letter was written; but he might not reach 'Corinth till after the letter arrived there.' (Acts xix. xxi.) (Paley.) With the brethren. Either those who had accompanied Timothy into Macedonia, or some whom the apostle expected from Corinth.

V. 12. It seems that a party at Corinth professed themselves attached to Apollos, in order to cover their opposition to the apostle: yet he greatly desired that eminent minister to go among them, with Timothy and Erastus, or with Stephanas and his friends, when they returned to Corinth, being of opinion that his presence would tend to allay their disputes, having the most entire confidence in his wisdom and humility. But, perhaps, Apollos feared lest his presence should have a contrary effect; or he might be fully employed in another place; or perhaps he thought it right to express his decided disapprobation of the conduct of the Corinthians, by absenting himself till they came to a better temper. However, he was not at all willing to go to Corinth at that time, though he intended to visit them when he could with more conveniency. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 13, 14. The apostle, about to conclude his epistle, called on the Corinthians, instead of presuming on their gifts and privileges, to be upon their guard against temptations, and vigilant in avoiding the snares of the great deceiver and his servants: he exhorted them to stand fast in the faith, as they were in great danger, and already began to waver: he reminded them to be valiant and prudent, as it became men, in their conflict with their common enemies; and not to behave like children in disputing with one another, and envying one another: he directed them to be strong in the grace of Christ for their work and warfare, instead of amusing themselves with curious speculations: and above all, he warned them to manage all their concerns according to the dictates of that love, which he had so fully explained and recommended to them, (Notes, xiii.)

V. 15—18. Stephanas seems to have been with the apostle at Ephesus, when he wrote this; but his household remained at Corinth. The several persons belonging to his family were qualified for usefulness, and ought to have possessed great influence in that Church; as they were the oldest converts to Christianity in all Achaia; and as they had habitually employed themselves in every service, by which they could minister to the good of their brethren. The apostle therefore besought the Christians at Corinth, to submit themselves to the counsel, influence, or ministry of this family; and of others, who concurred with him, in his endeavours to promote the peace and purity of the Church, or laboured diligently in that good cause. The coming of Stephanas and his companions, (who had probably brought an epistle to him from some of the Church at Corinth,) had given him pleasure, because they had further explained all things concerning the state of the Church; and their representation of the proper disposition of many of them, together with their pious conversation, had refreshed his spirit, as they doubtless had frequently refreshed theirs: he therefore admonished them to acknowledge such persons as those, for the servants of Christ and examples for them to follow; in preference to those teachers, who undermined or opposed his apostolical authority. Fortunatus is mentioned by Clemens Romanus, long after, as the bearer of this epistle to the Corinthians.

V. 19, 20. (Notes, Rom. xvi. 1—16. 21—23.)—Aquila and Priscilla were at Ephesus, when this epistle was written; but they had returned to Rome, before the apostle wrote to the Christians in that city.

V. 21—24. An amanuensis had written the rest of the epistle, but the apostle thought proper to add what follows with his own hand; and to unite a most solemn warning, with his affectionate salutations; that it might make the deeper impression. Whatever gifts, knowledge, eloquence, or eminence, any man possessed; if he did not love the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be anathema maran-atha. If he had not a cordial affection and love to the person, salvation, precepts, cause, glory, and people of Christ, he was and would be accursed, until, and when, the Lord should come, though not an open enemy to him and his cause. If his conduct proved this, let him be separated from the Church, as an accursed thing devoted to destruction: and in case he did not afterwards believe, repent, and believe with that "faith which worketh by love;" Christ himself would execute this awful sentence when he came to judge the world. But in case it could not be proved, or was not suspected by men, yet it was known to the Lord: and he who had not genuine love to the Saviour, certainly abode under the wrath of God, and would at last sink into utter destruction as a sacrifice to his justice. For he must be an enemy to the holy perfections and righteous government of God, an unhumbled impenitent sinner, and an unbeliever under the covenant of works and the curse of the law, he must be destitute of all true holiness, incapable of spiritually performing any good work, and unfit for the employment and pleasures of heaven, who, under the profession of Christianity, did not love the Lord Jesus Christ, or who apostatized from that profession. The word Anathema is Hebrew, and signifies, in Scripture, an accursed thing devoted to destruction: Maran-atha is Syriac, and signifies, the Lord cometh. Some Jewish usages are supposed to be referred to; but the above is the undoubted meaning of the passage. (Marg. Ref.) The apostle, however, did not write this awful warning, (for which he saw too much occasion in the conduct of the Corinthian teachers,) from resentment or harshness of disposition: he therefore expressed his earnest desire that the grace and favour of the Lord Jesus might be with them, and rest on them: and he concluded by such an assurance of his cordial love to them all in Christ, and for his sake, as is not found in any other epistle. To this he annexed his Amen, as assuring them of his sincerity in it, notwithstanding the rebukes which he had given them, and the improper treatment which he had received from them.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

It is incumbent on ministers to exhort their people to liberal charity, especially towards their brethren in Christ; and to direct them in the best way of collecting and applying their contributions; and all Christians ought to be ready for such good works, in proportion as the Lord prospers them in their secular concerns. When a little is weekly appropriated to such purposes, it is parted with more conveniently, and less reluctantly, than when greater sums are required at once. For it is considered as a part of the weekly expense, and so spared in other things: but, without some arrangement of this kind, the fund for charity is often previously spent on superfluities, and the sum required cannot well be afforded. Such weekly collections, therefore, as are made by several laudable societies in London and many other places, in which even poor people and mechanics, by the constant payment of trivial contributions, raise annually large sums for the relief of the sick and destitute, cannot too warmly be recommended. Much real good is done by them: the Gospel is adorned and recommended, an excellent example is exhibited, and the rich are excited to a proportionable liberality. May such societies be established in all the churches of Christ! These charitable works well consist with the design of the Christian sabbath: but when the funds are raised, prudent, pious, disinterested, and humane persons should be chosen to apply them: nor ought any man to deem such a service foreign to his place, except he be necessarily engaged in still more important services. All our purposes should be formed in submission to the will of God; and our conduct should be regulated by the dispensations of his providence, in connexion with the precepts of his word. Ministers ought not readily to leave those places, in which great and effectual doors are open to them, even though there be many adversaries: nay, this circumstance may often render it more incumbent on them to continue in their post, though dangerous and difficult, that they may establish and encourage the weak or wavering. It is wonderful that they, who attend on the work of the Lord in the most faithful manner, should have cause for fear among professors of the Gospel; or be in danger of being despised and disquieted by them. Yet, the prevalence of party, the influence of corrupt teachers, or the infection of lax principles, frequently produces this effect; especially, when they who are required to reprove, rebuke, and exhort with all authority, are young, diffident, or deficient in external accomplishments. But senior ministers should use their influence to repress this spirit, that their faithful young brethren may be secured from contempt, enabled to do their work in peace, and receive due kindness from those among whom they labour. The zealous servants of Christ will commonly be harmonious among themselves, even when their injudicious hearers place them in competition with each other; they will concur in opposing such evils, though they may have different opinions about the best method of remedying them; and therefore they will leave others to follow their own judgment, even when different from their own.

V. 12—24.

Exhortations to vigilance, constancy in duty, steadfastness in the faith, and mutual love, can never be unseasonable. They who have addicted themselves to the labour of love, in ministering to the saints, are most worthy of respect and imitation; and not they, who are fluent in speech, and forward to assume the lead in public concerns. We should also willingly submit to those who are experienced and mature in the faith of Christ; or who labour to promote that cause, for which the apostles spent and laid down their lives. Faithful and pious persons may supply what is lacking in each other; and their conversation will refresh the spirits of such as are like-minded. Christians, though divided by seas and mountains, and though they disapprove of some things in each others creed or practice, will yet cordially wish well to and pray for one another. But they, who "love not the Lord Jesus," can be Christians only in name: and they must certainly abide under an awful curse, which the Lord, when he cometh, will execute. Our obligations to the divine Saviour, and our reasons for loving him, are infinite: yet many who are called by his name, who profess his truth, nay, who preach his Gospel, are strangers to this holy affection, and only seek their own advantage, credit, ease, or pleasure, in their religious performances. They may conceal this fatal defect from the most discerning of their fellow-servants; but the Lord, when he cometh, will surely detect it. Let us then call ourselves to account in this matter, and not be satisfied with any religion, which does not include the love of Christ, earnest desires of his salvation, gratitude for his mercies, zeal for his glory, and obedience to his commandments. Let us inquire, whether we do indeed count all things worthless, compared with Christ and his righteousness? Whether we be willing to give up worldly objects, when they come in competition with him? Whether we love his image in his people, and be willing to deny ourselves, that we may communicate to their wants? Whether we love his ordinances, as means of communion with him? Whether we rejoice to hear him glorified, and grieve to see him dishonoured? Whether we allow ourselves in any known sin, or the neglect of any known duty? By these inquiries, impartially answered, we may form a good judgment of the state of our souls. But while we warn those around us not to deceive themselves, we should beware of the appearance of anger and resentment. We should desire that the grace of Christ may be with those whom we thus caution, and we ought to assure those of our cordial love in Christ, whom we see it needful to reprove and warn in the most plain and solemn manner.

THE

CORINTHIANS.

This epistle seems to have been written about a year after the foregoing, while the apostle was on his progress through Macedonia. Having heard by Titus, that his first epistle had produced very good effects on many of the Corinthians, he wrote this also, in order to prepare the way more completely for his visit to them; and it is probable, sent it immediately by Titus, and others who accompanied him. In it he justified himself from the charge of levity or carnal policy, in delaying his journey to Corinth; and assigned those reasons, for this part of his conduct, which could not have been disclosed with propriety, till the effect of his former epistle had appeared. He also gave directions respecting the restoration of the incestuous person, who had been excommunicated. He then expatiated on his conduct in the Christian ministry; intermixing many exhortations with the avowal of his motives and fervent affections in his sacred work. With great address and earnestness he recommended to them the collections for the poor Christians at Jerusalem, and showed the manifold advantages of such services. At length he more directly, yet evidently with great reluctance, contrasted his own gifts, labours, sufferings, and conduct, with the pretences of their false teachers; and showed himself not a whit inferior to any of the apostles. And he then concluded with various admonitions and affectionate good wishes. These epistles may appear to some readers less interesting than several others, because they mainly refer to the peculiar circumstances of the Corinthian Church; but in fact they are the more instructive on that very account: as directions and admonitions, suited to many of the more ordinary incidents of life, are communicated by them; which could not have been so advantageously adduced, in a more general discourse on the great doctrines and duties of Christianity.

The most remarkable circumstance in this epistle, is the confidence of the apostle in the goodness of his cause, and in the power of God to bear him out in it. Opposed, as he then was, by a powerful and sagacious party, whose authority, reputation, and interest were deeply concerned, and who were ready to seize on every thing, which could discredit St. Paul; it is wonderful to hear him so firmly insist on his apostolical authority; and so unreservedly appeal to the miraculous powers, which he had exercised, and conferred, at Corinth. So far from shrinking from the contest, as afraid of some discovery being made, unfavourable to the common cause; he, with great modesty and meekness indeed, but with equal boldness and decision, expressly declares that his opposers and despisers were the ministers of Satan; and menaces them with miraculous judgments, when as many of their deluded hearers had been brought to repentance, and re-established in the faith, as proper means could in a reasonable time effect. It is inconceivable that a stronger internal testimony, not only of integrity, but of divine inspiration, can exist. Had there been any thing of imposture among the Christians, it was next to impossible but such a conduct must have occasioned the disclosure of it.

CHAP. I.

The apostle salutes the Corinthians, 1, 2; and blesses God for consolations and deliverance in extreme danger, lately vouchsafed to him; for the benefit and comfort of others also, as well as an earnest to him of future deliverances, 3—11. He rejoices in the testimony of his conscience; and expresses his confidence of their attachment to him, which had induced him to purpose a journey to them, 12—16. His delay of his journey to Corinth did not arise from fickleness, 17, 18. He states the stability of the promises of God through Christ, and the security of believers, 19—22; and declares that he had postponed his visit from lenity towards the Corinthians, 23, 24.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1—7. (Notes, Rom. i. 1—8. 1 Cor. i. 1—3.) The apostle joined his beloved Timothy with himself in this second epistle to the Corinthians, that he might establish his reputation and influence among them: hence we learn that Timothy was come to him from Ephesus, before he wrote it. 'He calls Timothy his brother, probably that he might not be despised for his youth.' (Whitby.) He addressed the epistle, not only to the Church of Corinth, but also to all the saints in Achaia; meaning all professed Christians, who were to be considered as saints in the judgment of charity. After the usual salutation, he abruptly broke forth in thanks and praises to God, as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, (and consequently of all believers in him,) as the Father of mercies, the Source and Author of every kind of mercy to sinful men, abounding in mercy and delighting in it; and as the God of all comfort, the inexhaustible and everlasting Spring of peace, joy and consolation, to all who trusted in him. 'It is observable that eleven of St. Paul's epistles begin with exclamations of joy, praise, and thanksgiving. As soon as he thought of a Christian Church, planted in one place or another, there seems to have been a flow of most lively affection accompanying the idea, in which all sensibility of his temporal affections, or theirs, were swallowed up, and the fulness of his heart must vent itself in such cheerful, exalted, and devout language.' (Doddridge.) Good tidings from the churches which had been planted by him always animated the apostle, and his heart was now full of satisfaction in what he had heard from Corinth by Titus. He therefore blessed God for comforting him and his companions in labour, amidst all their troubles and persecutions, that they might be able to encourage others who were in trouble, by suggesting the same topics which God had made use of for their comfort. They could also assure their brethren of the sufficiency of divine consolations; seeing, in their own case, they had experienced, that, as sufferings for Christ's sake, and such as he endured, abounded in them, so their consolations also abounded in proportion, by the grace of Christ and the joy of his salvation. When, therefore, they were afflicted, they considered these painful trials as allotted them in order to qualify them for their work, in promoting the consolation and salvation of their hearers. These blessings were efficaciously communicated to the souls of believers, by means of sufferings similar to those of the apostle; and the example of constancy, patience and fortitude, which he and his brethren exhibited, tended to embolden their Brethren for sufferings, and to animate them in persevering under them; and their experimental and sympathizing exhortations and instructions led them to behave properly under their trials, and to derive benefit from them. On the other hand, when the apostle and his helpers were comforted, their consolations were intended for the encouragement of their people also, as tending to illustrate the faithfulness of God to his promises, and his gracious readiness to support those who suffered for his sake, and by showing them how comfort might be found. These considerations both reconciled them to sufferings, and rendered consolations doubly welcome. The apostle's hope concerning the Corinthians was rendered steadfast by what he had heard, notwithstanding all that had been reprehensible; as it was evident they shared in his sorrow and uneasiness, and were willing to partake of his sufferings for Christ's sake; and therefore he was assured that they would partake also of his consolation in Christ. Even the Father, &c. This style seems to be adopted under the New Testament, to distinguish the one living and true God from all other objects of worship, (without excepting the Supreme Being of deists and infidels;) as that of "the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob," had been under the Old Testament, to distinguish Jehovah from Baal or Jupiter, or other imagined deities. None was the true God, but the God of Abraham, &c.; none is the true God, but the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. (Marg. Ref.)

11 Ye also [z] helping together by prayer for us, [a] that for the gift bestowed upon us by the means of many persons, thanks may be given by many on our behalf.

V. 8—11. Some think that the apostle here referred to his sufferings in Asia, (Acts xiv.) but this was so long before, that he would scarcely have thus mentioned it on that occasion. As he seems to have written this Epistle from Philippi, or at least when he was in Macedonia, as Ephesus was the chief city of Asia, according to the sense in which the apostle always uses that word, and as he had just before been driven away by Demetrius, and the tumult excited by him, it is probable that he referred to the furious persecutions attending on that transaction.—'It may be said, perhaps, that it does not appear from the history, that any danger threatened St. Paul's life in the uproar at Ephesus, so imminent as that from which in the epistle he represents himself to have been delivered. This matter, it is true, is not stated by the historian in form; but the personal danger of the apostle, we cannot doubt, must have been extreme, when the whole city was filled with confusion; when the populace had seized his companions; when, in the distraction of his mind, he insisted on coming forth amongst them; when the Christians who were about him would not suffer him; when his friends, certain of the chief of Asia, sent to him, desiring that he would not adventure himself into the tumult; when, lastly, he was obliged to quit immediately the place and the country; and "when the tumult was ceased to depart into Macedonia."—'Nothing could be more expressive of the circumstances in which the history describes him to have been, at the time when the epistle purports to have been written,' (than the verses under consideration.) 'It is the calm recollection of a mind emerged from the confusion of instant danger. It is that devotion and solemnity of thought which follows a recent deliverance.—There is just enough of particularity in the passage, to show that it is to be referred to the tumult at Ephesus.' (Paley.) The apostle, however, had been weighed down with distress, which was beyond measure grievous, from the concurrence of outward dangers and hardships, with inward disquietude about the state of the churches; so that they were insupportable by any strength which he had previously possessed, and he was by them led to despair of being any longer preserved in life, to execute his plans of future usefulness. He even considered himself as a condemned person having the sentence of death in himself, in that he judged his doom inevitable. Nor, indeed, had he any method of escape by his own contrivance or efforts, or any confidence in himself; but he was brought to trust only in God, who by his almighty power raiseth the dead, and was therefore able to rescue him. Accordingly, he had delivered him from so imminent a peril of death, when it seemed to have taken hold of him, and he still continued to deliver him from the rage of his enemies: he therefore was encouraged to trust that he would yet deliver him, and preserve his life for future usefulness. This he expected, in answer to the prayers of the Corinthians, who, he doubted not had thus assisted him, and would continue to do so; that his life and term of usefulness being preserved by means of the prayers of many persons, numbers might also unite in blessing God on his account, and for the benefit derived through his ministry. In all this he spoke in the plural number, as joining his fellow-labourers with him; but he doubtless meant it with special reference to his own case.

V. 12—14. Many of the Corinthians had been prejudiced against the apostle, and some still insinuated several things to his disadvantage; but amid this discouragement, and all his other trials, he possessed a constant source of joy and exultation in the testimony of his own conscience. For though, as a sinner, he could only rejoice and glory in Christ Jesus, yet, as a believer, he might rejoice and glory in his inward consciousness of being truly what he professed and appeared to be; and especially in that he had been enabled to exercise his sacred ministry with simplicity and singleness of heart, aiming only to glorify God, by doing good to men; and in that godly sincerity, that unadulterated integrity, which sprang from the fear and love of God, and approved itself to him. For he had not been warped by carnal wisdom, from any concealed aim at his own interest, reputation, or authority, to use duplicity or dissimulation, but had acted under the influence of divine grace, in forming and executing such designs as were best suited to promote the conversion of sinners, and the prosperity of the Church, without regarding the reproaches and sufferings to which he was exposed on that account. This had been his habitual conduct in every part of the world, ever since he had been called to profess and preach the Gospel; but he had more abundantly manifested this disinterested self-denying spirit, this simplicity, "and godly sincerity," in his whole behaviour towards the Corinthians, though they had been the first to suspect and accuse him of the contrary. He, however, now wrote no other things on this subject, than what they read in the former epistle, or than appeared to be the obvious meaning of his words; that is, he wrote to them in candour and artless simplicity, not covering his designs by specious and ambiguous language; nay, he wrote nothing but what most of them acknowledged to be true, and he trusted would acknowledge to the end. They had indeed acknowledged him in part, (or part of them,) to have been the instrument of their conversion, and avowed that they rejoiced and gloried in their relation to him, and in his attention to them; and this was no more than corresponded to his rejoicing, or glorying, in them, and on their account, which he trusted would be continued even unto the day of Christ, when he should come to judge the world.

V. 15, 16. Confiding in the testimony of his conscience, and in the affections of the Corinthians in general, the apostle had purposed to visit them before that time, in the firm persuasion, that, according to his earnest desires, they would derive a second benefit from him, for their establishment and consolation by grace. This shows he had been only once at Corinth at this time, (Note, xii. 14, 15.) He had intended to pass by Corinth in his way to Macedonia, and to call as he went, and then afterwards to return and make a longer stay. This must have been his plan, for Corinth was out of his way into Macedonia; nor could it be supposed that he would come near that city, except in order to visit the Christians there. (Note, 1 Cor. xvi. 7.) Probably he had given some other intimation of his purpose to the Corinthians, than that which is contained in the former epistle. He, however, saw reason to alter his design, and to go into Macedonia by Troas.

V. 17—20. The apostle's opponents at Corinth seem to have urged his deviation from his first purpose, though made on the best grounds, and for the most benevolent purposes, as a proof that he was an inconstant and unstable man, who altered his conduct and doctrine as circumstances required, and as suited his present conveniency. But would they believe such accusations against him? Would they ascribe his conduct to levity? Or would they conclude that his purposes were formed and changed from worldly policy, so that he affirmed or denied, taught or retracted, as best suited his interest or ambition? Some of them might indeed suspect him of this, and make it an argument against his doctrine; but, as God was true and faithful, to whom he made his appeal, his word, or preaching to them, was not proposed in this fickle and wavering manner; he had never contradicted what he had once taught them, nor said nay in any point, after he had said yea respecting it, but he had steadily persisted in one uniform testimony; so that the doctrine preached by him, Silas, and Timothy, had been like its great Author, "the "Son of God, Jesus the Messiah," who is "the same "yesterday, to-day, and for ever." Thus they had proposed his salvation to the Corinthians, with the most entire consistency and unwavering steadfastness. They had not said first yea, and then nay, in these matters, but had constantly declared that all salvation was to be found in him alone, and that the covenant of grace and all its engagements were fully confirmed in him to all, who are found one with him by faith. In these doctrines they had been most explicit and decided, though in various matters of less importance they had used a prudent self-denying accommodation, and had been careful not to instruct the people in the deeper mysteries of Christianity, before they were able to bear them. (Notes, 1 Cor. iii. 9.) In this uniform and constant testimony the apostle persisted, because he knew that all the promises of God to his people, throughout the Scripture, were made in and by Jesus Christ, and that all centered in him, the great Surety of the new covenant, by which they are made to sinners; and that, by giving his Son to be the Saviour of sinners, God had verified his ancient predictions, proved the divine original of the Scriptures, and given an assurance of fulfilling his largest promises to all believers. Thus he had, as it were, 21 Now he which [a] stablisheth us with you in Christ, and hath [b] anointed us, is God;

22 Who hath also [c] sealed us, and given the [d] earnest of the Spirit in our hearts.

23 Moreover, [e] I call God for a record upon my soul, [f] that to spare you I came not as yet unto Corinth.

24 Not for [g] that we have dominion over your faith, but [h] are helpers of your joy: [i] for by faith ye stand.

set his irrevocable Amen to the promises which he had before given; he had confirmed them by the surest evidence that could be imagined; he had, as it were, pledged his own glory for the performance of them; his truth and perfections would be dishonoured, if they should fail of accomplishment, while the performance of them would every way redound to the glory of God, in the salvation of all believers, by means of the preaching of the apostles and other ministers. 'There is a yea which is as a nay, and 'a nay which is as yea; but the just man's yea is yea, 'and his nay is nay. When a man gives a bill of divorce 'to his wife, we try him three times, whether his nay 'be nay, and his yea, yea.' (Jewish writers in Whitby.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 21, 22. The apostle's established belief of these truths, his reliance on these promises, and constancy in his ministry, were not the result of human wisdom or outward teaching, but were effected by the power of God, who had brought the Corinthians also to a firm faith in Christ, and to fellowship with him. God had anointed them by his teaching and sanctifying grace, and so removed their natural blindness and prejudice against the truth. He had also sealed them, both to mark them for his own, and to secure them to himself, by enstamping the divine image upon their souls, through the new-creating power of his Spirit, whose graces and holy consolations were the earnest, and pledge, and foretaste, in their hearts, of the heavenly inheritance to which they were called. From these causes the apostle derived his constancy and confidence in preaching the Gospel, and believers were influenced by them to hold fast their faith without wavering. Some indeed interpret "the anointing," of miraculous powers, and "the seal," of the sacraments; but as the apostle includes the Corinthians with him in these things, so it is more consistent with the tenour of Scripture to explain the anointing, of such divine communications as belong to Christians in general, and of which none else partake. (Marg. Ref.) Sacraments are but outward seals of the covenant, and neither distinguish believers from others, nor secure all who partake of them, and miraculous powers have been exercised by very wicked men; but the renewal of the divine image on the soul in sanctification, and the love of God shed abroad in the heart by the Holy Spirit, form a seal and earnest of a far more distinguishing and permanent nature. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 23, 24. Having thus vindicated his conduct and doctrine from the charge of inconsistency, the apostle, in the most solemn manner, called God to witness the truth of what he was about to assert; he desired that he would testify for or against him, as he saw the case to be, and he could expect nothing but awful judgments on his soul, if he spake falsely after such an appeal. With this introduction he declared, that he had postponed his visit to Corinth, in order to spare them those censures and miraculous judgments, which he feared would have been unavoidable, if he had gone thither immediately on leaving Ephesus. He had not then received any information what effect his former epistle had produced; he was aware that time would be required to bring their affairs into some better state, and he thought it more adviseable to wait a little longer, that he might at length come, not "with a "rod, but in love and in the spirit of meekness." He did not mean by this to claim an absolute authority in dictating to them, as of himself, what they should believe, or even to insist, in a dogmatical manner, on their receiving every particular which he taught them by the command of Christ. He had not thus usurped dominion, or lorded it over them, "in respect of the faith," as the clause may be rendered; but had before acted, and was still disposed to act, with gentleness and forbearance, as a helper of their joy and consolation in Christ, by his instructions, admonitions, and counsels. Yet he deemed it necessary, as the servant and representative of Christ, to act with authority, and even sharpness, against such as perverted the Gospel, and corrupted its doctrines; for "by "faith," they stood accepted with God, and were enabled to stand steadfast amidst trials and temptations. Those persons, therefore, who perverted the faith by false doctrines and corrupt practices, were about to take from them that support by which they stood, to cause them to fall into various evils, to mar their joy, and to do them immense mischief, if not opposed. As helpers of their joy, therefore, the apostle and his friends must take a decided part against these enemies to their holiness and comfort.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

* * *

The Church of God is his peculiar residence, in which he displays his glory and communicates his grace; all therefore who belong to it should be saints, devoted and conformed unto him. Many persons, however, of a different character, will intrude among them; but "grace "and peace from God our Father, and our Lord Jesus "Christ," will be given to the saints alone. We sinners, who have believed in Christ, should ever be ready to bless and praise our God, even amidst sharp sufferings. He is "the Father of mercies and the God of all comfort;" nor can we expect too much from his infinite compassion and love, or too highly celebrate the praises of what he hath already done for us. We must expect tribulations; they are needful, profitable, and unavoidable; and they who have been most honoured by the Lord Jesus have also been most conformed to him in sufferings; but he pro-

The apostle shows his purpose, of not coming to Corinth in heaviness; and the grief with which he had written his former epistle, 1—4. He directs the Corinthians to forgive and restore the incestuous person, as he had forgiven him in Christ's name, 5—11. His uneasiness, at not finding Titus at Troas, had induced him to go directly into Macedonia, 12, 13. He blesses God for the joy and triumph, which had attended his faithful preaching of the gospel in every place, 14—17.

portions his consolations to the troubles of such, as simply trust and serve him; and he thus renders them capable of comforting others, by the comfort with which they are comforted of God. The afflictions and consolations of ministers, especially, are often intended for the sake of others, as well as themselves; that, by their example, experience, counsels, and exhortations, they may promote the consolation and salvation of the people. For these blessings are commonly brought home to men's hearts by means of trials and afflictions; and the minister, who is a stranger to sufferings and divine consolations, can seldom duly sympathize with the mourners, counsel the tempted, encourage the dejected, or even bear with the infirmities of the weak. This should reconcile us to our sorrows, and teach us to seek benefit from them: and it should animate us to more earnest prayer for proportionable grace and consolation, that we may exhibit an edifying example under trials; for assuredly we shall rejoice in heaven on account of the sharpest of those afflictions, which have been rendered subservient to our salvation, and that of any of our Lord's beloved people. We may have a steadfast hope of such professed Christians, as sympathize with the afflicted servants of Christ, and are willing to suffer for his sake; being confident, that, as they partake of the sufferings, they shall also share the consolations of his Gospel. The Lord sometimes permits his children to be pressed out of measure, even above strength, and to be driven almost to despair of deliverance; that, having the sentence of death in themselves, they may learn more simply to trust in his almighty power and all-sufficient grace.—This often occurs in the concerns of their own souls: inward temptations and conflicts, connected with outward difficulties, fill them with desponding fears and anxieties; they are made to feel, that infinite mercy and omnipotent grace alone can preserve them from the most terrible downfals, or even from final ruin: thus they are driven from all self-confidence, and learn to cast themselves wholly on God: and when he hath repeatedly rescued them "from so great a death," they admire his truth, power, and love, and are encouraged to hope that he will yet deliver them, and make them victorious over all their enemies. In such scenes of conflict and terror, especially, we feel that we need the prayers of our brethren: and we should thence learn to pray for all, who are tried and tempted; as well as to unite in thanksgivings with such as have received gracious deliverances. Thus all our trials and mercies, being mixed with prayers and praises, will terminate in the glory of God, and in our own and each others spiritual advantage. And even the most afflicted Christian, who is fully assured of eternal felicity, ought to desire and value life, as long as God is pleased to make him useful to the souls of men, and an instrument of promoting his glory.

V. 12—16.

If we would have comfort amidst troubles, reproaches, suspicions, and slanders, we must seek for the rejoicing in the testimony of our conscience. If indeed we are upright in our professed repentance, and faith in Christ and his atoning blood, and careful to serve the Lord in simplicity and godly sincerity, according to our places in his church and in the community; and if we have our conversation in the world, not by fleshly wisdom, but by "the grace of "God;" we may greatly exult in these evidences of our acceptance in Christ, and our adoption into the family of God; and may take this comfort as an abundant counterpoise to every calumny, and even as a sure anticipation of the favourable sentence of our Judge in the great day of account. Yet we need not wonder, if we be suspected by those persons to whom, and for those actions in which, we have behaved most conscientiously. Sometimes simplicity and godly sincerity may require that line of conduct, which to superficial or prejudiced observers may have a contrary appearance: and on some occasions a man may be deemed inconstant because he will not go the whole length of a party, and coincide with them in their follies, mistakes, and sins. We should, however, leave our characters in the Lord's hands; only using proper means to clear them, when the credit of the Gospel, or our usefulness, calls for it. Ministers, and the people who have profited by their labours, should now rejoice in each other, as they may expect to do at the last day. Whatever interferes with this reciprocal joy and affection should be guarded against; and believers should be careful not to grieve, by neglect and unkindness, those faithful friends, to whom, under God, they owe their eternal salvation, and who are concerned for their best welfare, with all the tenderness of affectionate parents. And ministers should desire to visit their beloved people, from whom they have been separated, not only for the comfort of their company, but that the people may have still further benefit from them.

V. 17—24.

It is very unjust and uncandid to ascribe every alteration in a man's purpose or conduct to lightness, instability, duplicity, or carnal policy; especially when his general character bears another stamp, and there may be good reasons for the change that hath taken place. If we are thus unjustly censured or suspected, we must make our appeal to God: yet it behooves us to be steady and constant in our conduct and profession, as far as we can, that we may "avoid the appearance of evil." This is peculiarly incumbent on the preachers of the Son of God, Jesus Christ, the AMEN, the true and faithful Witness; in whom all the promises of God are given and confirmed in the most steadfast and unchangeable manner, "to the "glory of God by us." What he hath already done leaves no room for us to doubt of the exact performance of every promise to all believers: his word, covenant, and dispensations, are so ordered as to give encouragement to the weakest faith. We may not only say, "Hath he "spoken, and will he not do it?" Hath he interposed with an oath, and will he now fail those, who "flee for "refuge to lay hold on this hope set before them?" But "he hath not spared his own Son; and will he not with "him freely give us all things?" Yet unbelief excludes men from the blessing; and many believers come short of comfort, because they are distrustful and of little faith. If then we have been established in Christ with these ancient believers, it is God that hath done this great thing for us: the sacred unction of his grace, the seal and earnest of his Spirit, and those holy tempers and gracious fruits, which attend our confidence and consolations, secure us from delusion in so important a matter, and distinguish genuine experience from all the joys of hypocrites, enthusiasts, and apostates. We should never call God to witness, except on important occasions and in the most solemn manner, when other ways of ascertaining the truth, and avouching our integrity, are insufficient, and momentous concerns are at stake; yet the example of the apostle, under the immediate inspiration of the Holy Spirit, fully proves, that solemn oaths in some cases are both lawful and expedient. The record of God will be on our souls, either to justify or condemn us: he "will "not hold those guiltless, who take his name in vain;" and we ought so to act, that in all ordinary cases our yea yea, nay nay, may be sufficient to ensure credit to our testimony. If the apostle did not exercise dominion over the faith of Christians, we should by no means call men master or father, or implicitly submit to their decisions and assertions; nor should we ever attempt to lord it in this manner over any part of God's heritage. We ought to remember, that ministers are the helpers of the joy of believers; and we should seek the increasing comfort of our brethren with prudent and persevering tenderness and affection. Yet as Christians stand by faith only, and all their joys must flow from the vigorous, uninterrupted and authorized exercise of that leading principle; so every thing that tends to weaken, mislead, and subvert the faith of professed Christians, must be watched against and opposed. Sometimes therefore genuine love, and a wise desire of helping the joy of believers, will dictate sharp rebukes and decided censures of those, who would deceive and corrupt them. It is, however, best to use more lenient measures, as far as there is a prospect of success; and to avoid even the appearance of severity, if it can be done consistently with prudence and faithfulness.

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1—4. The apostle had determined in himself that he would not, if it could be avoided, make his intended visit to the Corinthians, till he could go with comfort to himself and them. He expected that he should prevail with them, by his epistles, to exclude such as remained refractory, and should also recover those who had been drawn aside: and then he might be able to go among them without that heaviness and distress of mind, which he must have felt, if he had been constrained to re-establish his authority by censures and punishments. When he had before visited Corinth, he had received and communicated joy; and he was not willing to come the second time in a sorrowful manner. Even his steady friends must have shared the sorrow, if he had been forced to exercise severity: and so his journey must have been distressing to them and to him. He had therefore written before, and he now wrote again, in order that the prevailing abuses might be redressed: lest he should receive sorrow from the very persons, in whose holy and comfortable walking he ought to have had rejoicing: and he was confident that they would approve of this plan, as he would not doubt but his joy was the joy of them all. No doubt the apostle knew, that this rule admitted of exceptions: but it was kind and prudent in him to express his favourable opinion of the Corinthians in general; and to represent the disaffected party to be so small, as not to bear any proportion to his friends and adherents. He had indeed written the former epistle, especially those parts of it which contained rebukes, in great affliction, and constrained by the anguish of his heart, at hearing distressing things concerning them; and he had wept abundantly at the painful necessity imposed on him: yet he had not intended by it to cause them needless grief; but rather to convince them of his more abundant love to them, by performing this most self-denying and distressing act of Christian friendship, even contrary to their inclinations, and at the hazard of incurring their displeasure.

8 Wherefore I beseech you, [q] that ye would confirm your love toward him.

V. 5—11. (Notes, 1 Cor. v.) The crime of the incestuous Corinthian, and the connivance of the Church had peculiarly troubled the apostle; but he had borne only a part of this grief, as many of them had shared it with him. This he mentioned, that he might not charge too much criminality on them, or be supposed to intimate that they had all alike been culpable in that transaction. As to the offender himself, let the rebuke and excommunication, which had been inflicted on him by many, (or by the Church and its ministers, acting according to the sentence and command of the apostle,) suffice for his punishment. It appeared to have had a salutary effect; and therefore, instead of further severity, they ought to forgive and encourage him, lest over-much sorrow should unfit him for his duty, or give Satan an opportunity of tempting him to hard thoughts of God and religion, to apostacy, or even to despair, which might swallow him up and occasion his ruin. St. Paul would therefore now entreat for the offender, as he before protested against him; and he besought them to confirm their love to him, by restoring him to communion, and by sympathising in his sorrow, that he might be assured their censures, though apparently severe, had proceeded from the same friendly disposition. Indeed, he had written so decidedly on this subject, to make trial of their prompt obedience to his apostolical authority; and their conduct had satisfied him that they were disposed to regard it in all things. He was therefore confident of their discretion; and ready, not only in this but in similar instances, to concur with them in receiving again into their communion, as penitent and pardoned, those who had been laid under the censures of the Church; this he would do for their benefit, in the presence of Christ, as representing his person, and as acting by his authority. (Notes, Matt. xvi. 19. John xx. 23.) He was also the more desirous of thus concurring in the reconciliation of the offender, lest Satan, their subtile adversary, should obtain some advantage by their delay, either by tempting the offender to despondency, by bringing an evil report on Christians, as rigorous and unforgiving, or by discouraging other offenders, deterring men from embracing the Gospel, exciting further divisions in the Church, or otherwise preventing the success of the Gospel. For he was not ignorant of the manifold devices of that enemy, and by what varied machinations he endeavoured to deceive and prejudice men's minds, and to disturb the peace of the Church. It is observable, that the apostle scrupulously avoided naming this scandalous offender.

V. 12, 13. After Paul had been driven from Ephesus, he went to Troas in his way to Macedonia, intending to stay a short time in that city to preach the Gospel, of which a favourable opportunity presented itself. (Notes, Acts xx. 1, 2.) But not meeting Titus there according to his expectation, and having received no tidings from Corinth, his mind was so discomposed about the affairs of that Church, that he could not comfortably continue at Troas; but he hastened into Macedonia to meet Titus, which he accordingly did, and his report had determined him to write this second epistle, and then to proceed leisurely through the Churches of Macedonia, before he visited Corinth.

V. 14—17. The happy turn given to the affairs of the Corinthians, the confidence which the apostle entertained of success in that undertaking, and his usefulness in other places, caused him to break forth in thankfulness to God amidst his difficulties and distresses. He had indeed sharp conflicts to sustain, but the Lord gave him such multiplied victories, that he went from city to city as a triumphant conqueror in the cause of Christ. And, as in triumphs abundance of odours were used, so the name and salvation of Jesus, ("as ointment poured forth,") was a sweet odour diffused by him in every place; so that he and his fellow labourers were pleasing and acceptable to God, by their testimony to Christ, and through his merits, as a sweet-smelling savour, not only in respect of those who were saved by their means, but also in those who perished through unbelief; for in both cases God was glorified by their preaching. To the one indeed their doctrine was an occasion of aggravated condemnation, through the depraved state of their hearts, and their enmity to it or abuse of it; even as costly odours are sometimes pernicious and fatal to

CHAP. III.

To obviate the charge of vain-glory, the apostle shows, that the conversion of the Corinthians was a sufficient attestation of Christ to his ministry, 1—3. He ascribes all his sufficiency and success to God, 4, 5; and proves the glory of the gospel to be superior to that of the law, 6—11; declaring that his plain speaking accorded to his ministry, which was less obscure than that of Moses, 12—14; showing the blindness of the Jews, which would be removed when they turned to the Lord, 15, 16; and describing the liberty and progressive holiness, which arose from faith in Christ and the illumination of the Holy Spirit, 17, 18.

diseased persons; and to the other their doctrine was as a delightful odour, that exhilarates the spirits, renews health, and prolongs life; for, loving and embracing the salutary message, they found it to be unto life and salvation. But, as such important consequences were connected with their sacred ministry, and as faithfulness alone could render it acceptable and honourable to God, or profitable to men, who of the human race could of himself be sufficient for such a service? Or who would dare to engage in it without trembling? (iii. 5, 6.) This obliquely hinted at the self-sufficiency of the Corinthian teachers; but they were more immediately intended, when he spake of many who sophisticated the word of God, as dishonest vintners do their wine, when they preserve something of the colour and taste, but dilute it, or mix it up with other liquids, which weaken it, prevent its efficacy, or even render it poisonous, in order to enhance their profits. Thus these teachers preserved some important truths in their preaching, to render it more specious, but they corrupted it by human inventions, philosophical conjectures, or lax opinions, till it became inefficacious, and even pernicious, to the souls of men; this they did, to pay court to the predjudices and inclinations of their followers, that they might establish their own influence, and gratify their avarice and ambition. Learned men have differed greatly in opinion about these corrupters of the Gospel, whether they were Judaizing Christians, or Gentile converts, or heretics, as the Gnostics in particular were; but, beyond all doubt, there were corrupters of the Gospel, at that time, of different descriptions, who perverted it in various ways. The apostle, however, was conscious that he was not actuated by such principles, nor left to adopt and propagate such delusions; on the contrary, in the most entire sincerity and simplicity, as sent by God and serving him, as influenced by his grace, and as acting in his sight, he spake of Christ and his salvation in every place, without at all consulting his own interest, or the inclinations of his hearers, except in order to their profit.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

We should always give pain reluctantly, even when it must be done; for, if we are of a truly Christian spirit, we shall share the heaviness and sorrow which we occasion. —It is a common case for faithful ministers to have sorrow from those of whom they ought to rejoice, and to be deprived of comfort even from the seals of their ministry, through the necessity they are under of making them sorrowful; whereas their joy ought to be the joy of all the people. That part of an affectionate minister's work which gives most offence, is often performed by him with great affliction and anguish of heart, and with many tears; so far is he from intending to grieve his beloved people, that he does violence to his own feelings, and ventures their displeasure from his abundant affection to them, and that he may, even against their will, preserve them if possible from the dangers to which the artifices of deceivers and their own inexperience expose them. Such ministers will be careful not to over-charge their brethren, and not to condemn them harshly or indiscriminately. They do not desire to magnify their own trials, or to multiply their complaints, they would have no censure employed or continued in force, without evident necessity, they will show kindness and speak comfort to the penitent, and take pleasure in restoring the most grievous offenders "in the "spirit of meekness," when it can be done consistently with the honour of the Gospel, and the purity of the Church, and they will exhort others to assure the offenders of their love, when salutary rebukes or discipline have had their proper effect. Though no man has a right to exercise dominion over the faith of his brethren, yet, as far as ministers act according to the commandments of Christ, they are authorized to expect obedience from the people, and they may sometimes properly make trial of it; yet they should always be ready to express a forgiving disposition; and when church-censures, ministerial rebukes, or the reconciliation of offenders, are regulated according to the word of Christ, and as in his presence, they will be valid, even as if he had been present in person to ratify them. We should always be upon our guard, lest Satan get an advantage against us; that subtle enemy knows how to avail himself of our mistakes, whether of ill-timed lenity or needless severity; he buoys up men with presumption, or pushes them to despair; he represents the ministers and professors of the Gospel as licentious, or as over strict, just as appearances vary; he raises contradictory slanders, to prejudice men against the truth, or to destroy the peace of the Church. We should therefore study, by attention to the Scriptures, by careful observation, by watching our own experiences, by conferring with our brethren, and by fervent prayer, to get acquainted with his devices, that we may counteract them.

V. 12—17.

It is perhaps impossible, in this present state, to separate fervent active zeal, from an over-anxious solicitude; and though we should not yield to any thing, that takes us off from our present work, yet it may sometimes be profitable for us to recollect, that even St. Paul could have no rest in his spirit in preaching at Troas, through his earnest desire to learn the state of the Corinthian Church. If, however, our hearts be right with God, our disquietudes will terminate in thanksgivings; our conflicts in victories and triumphs: and the labours of the faithful minister will be accepted and graciously rewarded by our God, whether his hearers be saved, or perish. But how dreadful is the case of numbers, to whom the blessed Gospel becomes "the savour of death unto death;" and the faithful and affectionate endeavours of ministers for their salvation serve only to seal and aggravate their condemnation! This is a painful thought to the servants of Christ; as they would gladly be "the savour of life unto life" to all, who come within the sound of their voice, or by any means can be made acquainted with their doctrine. But how should the consideration of the consequences which must follow on our preaching, to ourselves, and our hearers, make us shrink back, as it were, under the consciousness of unworthiness and insufficiency! especially as so many still corrupt the word of God, to their own ruin, and that of their deluded followers. May we then inquire how the case is with us; may we carefully watch ourselves in this matter; and seek the testimony of our consciences, under the teaching of the Holy Spirit, that "as of sincerity, as of God, in the sight of God, so we "may speak in Christ!" May the Lord send forth many such ministers into his Church, and stop the mouths of all false teachers; and may every Christian learn to distinguish between faithful shepherds, and all kinds of wolves and foxes in sheep's clothing!

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1—3. The apostle's opponents would be ready to censure the foregoing declaration, as another instance of his commending himself; of which, it is probable, they alleged that his former epistle contained some examples: but could the Christians at Corinth, in general, suspect him of being actuated by such motives? Did he or his friends need such a testimony to their character? Was there any occasion for other churches to give them recommendatory letters to the Corinthians? Or that the Corinthians should thus testify to their character, for the satisfaction of other churches? This indeed was the case of some, who had come in among them with an ambiguous character and mission; and who wanted, and received such recommendations; but the apostle had no need of them. For the Corinthians themselves were his epistle of commendation; it was written in their hearts, (as some explain it, perhaps without sufficient authority from manuscripts or copies,) and legible in their lives; so that men of every nation and language might read and understand the import of it. Or, he so valued this testimonial, and so loved them as the seals of his ministry, that he had this epistle, as it were, engraven in his heart. For they were manifestly declared to all men, to be Christ's epistle recommending his ministry, which he had employed him in framing. This was not written with ink on paper, but by the Spirit of the living God; nor engraven, as the law was, by the finger of God on tables of stone, but on fleshly tables of the heart; their hearts having been softened, humbled, and prepared to receive this divine impression, by the new-creating power of the Holy Spirit. 'In your hearts, made soft and pliable, and ready to obey 'the word, by the operation of the Holy Spirit, according 'to the promise, Ez. xi. 19. xxxvi. 26.' (Whitby.) As the apostle therefore firmly believed them to be true Christians, so they could not doubt but he was the apostle of Christ: their conversion sufficiently recommended him and his doctrine, and he needed no other testimonial.

V. 4—6. The preceding considerations gave the apostle such confidence, through Christ, in his cause and in those things which pertained to God, that he spake to the Corinthians in that bold manner of himself and of his ministry, which they censured. Not that he or his associates professed any sufficiency for so important a trust and work, as of themselves, or by any natural wisdom, ability, or good disposition, above other men: they could not execute their ministry faithfully or successfully, if left to themselves, they could not think a good thought without divine grace; they made no estimation of themselves in this great concern; but allowed and were deeply sensible, that all their sufficiency was of God. He indeed had made them able, faithful, and successful ministers of the New Testament, or covenant, which was ratified with believers through the blood of Christ, and ensured to them all spiritual and eternal blessings: and, while they gave him all the glory, they could not but be conscious of what he had done for them and by them; nor might they shun to speak with authority and decision in his cause. For they had not been the ministers of a mere letter, but of a doctrine that was accompanied by the operation of the Holy Spirit to render it efficacious: for the mere letter would have proved an occasion of condemnation and death to the hearers; but the Spirit gave life and salvation to them through the Gospel. This is commonly understood restrictively of the legal and evangelical dispensations, contrasted with each other, and the context seems to favour this interpretation: yet it is not satisfactory, as proposed in a general manner; for the legal dispensation was not a killing letter to all that were under it, nor is the Gospel in all cases attended by the life-giving Spirit. But the legal dispensation derived all its saving efficacy from the Gospel, to which it referred; and, after the publication of Christianity, it became altogether a killing letter to those who cleaved to it. For the Gospel was "the ministration of "the Spirit," and the only doctrine through which life and salvation were communicated to sinners, as the apostle shows more fully in the next verses. The moral law indeed is universally "found unto death," to all who remain under it; but the ceremonies and types, together with the prophecies, gave ancient believers a feeble discovery of mercy and grace, through the promised Saviour: yet these to unbelievers were a mere lifeless form, which left them under the condemnation of the moral law, and even added to it. But then it must be remembered, that the Gospel itself, and its ministers, are "a savour of death "unto death" to unbelievers; who often make the same formal use of some evangelical truths, and an attendance on Christian ordinances, which the Jews did of the Mosaic ceremonies, and the traditions of the elders: and in this way, and many others, "the letter," even of the New Testament, "kills;" and it only gives life, when accompanied "by the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus." To understand "the letter and the spirit," of a literal and an allegorical interpretation of Scripture, is both foreign to the apostle's argument, and also palpably absurd and extremely dangerous. Some parts of Scripture are allegorical, and must be so interpreted: but surely laws, doctrines, promises, exhortations, and historical facts, must be literally understood by all, who do not seek to misunderstand them!

V. 7—11. The Corinthians undervalued the authority of the apostle as the minister of Christ; but he here showed them, how far the ministry of the New Testament excelled that of the Old. The moral law alone was written and engraven in stones; and it was properly the ministration of death and condemnation, by leaving every transgressor under the curse denounced by it: but the unbelieving Jews turned the whole Mosaic dispensation into a mere covenant of works, to their own condemnation. Both the holy, just, and good law, and the legal dispensation, as connected with it, and introductory to the Gospel, were glorious: the whole had the stamp of divinity upon it, and was expressive of the justice, holiness, and truth of God. As an emblem of this, the face of Moses, when he came down from the mount with the tables of the law, and the ratification of that covenant, shone in such a manner that the Israelites could not steadfastly look at it; which caused him to wear a veil in their presence. Yet this represented the glory of that dispensation, which was to be abolished by the introduction of the new covenant in Christ. If, then, the ministry of that dispensation, which, considered apart from the Gospel, could only leave men under the sentence of death, spiritual, temporal, and eternal, was so glorious, and imparted such honour to Moses, how could it be supposed, that the ministry of the New Testament, through which especially the sanctifying Spirit was given to sinners, as the seal and earnest of eternal life, should not be glorious and honourable to those intrusted with it? If that ministry which in itself tended only to condemnation, contained such a display of the divine glory, as rendered the exercise of it honourable; how should not that ministry, by which condemned sinners are taught the way of righteousness, by faith in Christ, and which contains so full and complete a discovery of the glory and harmony of God's perfections, confer far greater honour on the apostles, who were employed to preach it to the world? Indeed, the glory of the law, and that of the legal dispensation, were so eclipsed by the excellent glory of the Gospel, as in this respect to be comparatively nothing; and after the publication of Christianity, the Mosaic dispensation had lost all its reflected glory and divine authority, and was become a lifeless letter and form to those who rejected Christ. If, then, that which was intended to be temporary, and at length to be abolished, had been glorious when Moses promulgated it, much more must the Gospel, which is intended to continue till the end of the world, as the last and most complete discovery of the divine truth and will, be glorious in itself, and honourable to those who were intrusted to reveal it to mankind. "It should be understood, that the law,' (of ten commandments,) 'is not considered simply, but as 'connected with the ministry of Moses, and as apart 'and distinct from the Gospel; in which respect it may 'be said to have been abolished, when the ministration of 'Moses was abolished. But thou wilt say, is the minis'tration of Moses abolished in this respect? By no means: 'for men must always be prepared for the Gospel by the 'preaching of the law. But this I say, that the minis‘ tration of Moses is in all cases abolished, when the manifest grace of the Gospel succeeds to the figurative preaching of the law.’ (Beza.) From this argument it is generally concluded, that the false teachers at Corinth Judaized: but it has before appeared, that their leading errors were of a different nature; though some might also be prone to run into that extreme. The apostle, however, seems to have principally intended to magnify his office; and to show, from the example of Moses, that the ministry of the New Testament was honourable, in proportion to the superior glory of that dispensation: and that he, as immediately intrusted with the important stewardship of the divine mysteries, as an inspired apostle, and as faithful in this service, had a right to demand respect and deference to his authority; which his opponents, whoever they were, refused him, and instructed their partizans to refuse him.

V. 12—16. Having this hope and confidence, that he was made of God an able minister of that glorious dispensation, by which the gift of righteousness and the life-giving Spirit were conferred on men, the apostle used great plainness, liberty, and boldness of speech: declaring without reserve "the whole counsel of God," and faithfully reproving what was false and sinful, as one that had authority and sufficiency from God. His doctrine was not hid in obscurity or ambiguity, or under types and shadows, as the legal dispensation had been, of which the veil on the face of Moses was a figure, or emblem. As this covering concealed the lustre of his countenance; so, the obscurity of that dispensation concealed its real glory; and the Israelites were unable to look steadfastly to Christ, the great End, Scope, and Substance of those ceremonies, which were shortly to be abolished. Even believers had only indistinct and transient glimpses of that glorious Object: and unbelievers looked no further than the outward institution, except as they expected a temporal deliverer and king. Thus their minds were generally blinded by pride, prejudice, and carnal lusts, which formed a veil over their hearts, in addition to that which was thrown over the Mosaic law: and this veil remained, to close their minds against the truth, even after the light of the Gospel had shown the real import of the legal ceremonies: so that, when the Jews read the Old Testament, the veil upon their hearts prevented them from understanding its true meaning, or deriving any spiritual benefit from it. For the veil is only done away in Christ; his doctrine tends to remove it from the written word: but faith in him, and the supply of his Spirit, must remove it from the heart, and enable the believer to perceive the spiritual meaning of the types, prophecies, and promises of the whole Scripture. For want of this the Jews at that time, (and their awful case is the same to this day,) had a veil on their hearts, when the law of Moses was read among them; nor could all their diligence, attention, or attachment to it, enable them to understand it in a saving manner. But when any individuals among them were converted to the Lord Jesus, this veil was removed from their minds: and this will be the case respecting the nation in general, when they shall, according as it is predicted, believe in their long rejected Messiah. (Notes, Ex. xxxiv. 29—35.) —Abolished. ‘Such an oblique manner of speaking on ‘this subject makes the argument peculiarly striking. ‘It is taken for granted, as a thing certainly known, and ‘quite indisputable, that the Mosaic dispensation was to ‘be abolished.’ (Doddridge.) ‘We, the ministers of ‘the Gospel, speak plainly and openly, and put no veil ‘upon ourselves, as Moses did, whereby to hinder the ‘Jews from seeing Christ in the law: but that which ‘hinders them is a blindness on their minds, which ‘remains to this day. Their unbelief comes not from ‘any obscurity in our preaching; but from a blindness ‘which rests upon their minds. But when their heart ‘shall turn to the Lord, the veil shall be taken away.’ (Locke.)

V. 17, 18. It appears from the preceding argument, that the Lord Jesus is that Spirit, or animating soul, which gives life to the letter of the Scriptures, and to believers. Without him, doctrines, promises, ordinances, and commandments, are a mere carcass of religion; the power and life of which wholly depends on their relation to his person, mediation, and grace: and without faith in him, and grace from him, all knowledge, ordinances, or external obedience, constitute a dead form of godliness. In both respects he is, as it were, the soul that animates the body, and gives activity, energy, and value, to every part of it. This union with Christ is effected by the indwelling of his Holy Spirit: and where this divine Agent, proceeding from the Father and the Son, and One with them, inhabits the heart, there is true liberty. He gives freedom from sin and Satan, from condemnation and servile principles, from the love of the world, and the fear of men: he enables the believer to find liberty in willing obedience, and in spiritually worshipping God. And he gives him confidence and boldness in his conduct among men, without regarding their censures and frowns, or courting their friendship or applause, from conscious integrity and satisfaction of the Lord's acceptance. Thus all Christians, in proportion to their degree of faith and grace, being enlightened by the Spirit of the Lord, behold with open face, as in a mirror, by faith exercised on divine revelation, the glory of God in the Person and work of his Son: and this glory, beaming upon their souls with transforming efficacy, (as opaque objects reflect the rays of the sun, and so become in a measure luminous,) they are gradually changed into his image of righteousness, purity, truth, and love, growing more and more like their beloved Saviour, in judgment, disposition, affections, and conduct, from one degree of this glorious holiness to another; even as by the work "of the Spirit of the Lord," or the Lord the Spirit, by which he new-creates the soul; and according to the measure in which he discovers to a man the glory of God in Christ, and enables him to behold it with open face and fixed admiration. Till at length the work will be perfected, when the view of faith, as in a mirror, shall be changed for immediate and perfect vision. (Marg. Ref.) Some expositors explain the "open," or unveiled, "face," to mean the face of Christ; rendering the words, "We all, in an unveiled face, beholding as in a glass the "glory of the Lord," &c. The glory of God in the face of Christ is certainly the object contemplated. The veil on the face of Moses implied, that this glory was but obscurely shown by his ministration: but the veil, by the ministration of righteousness and of the Spirit, is removed, so that the glory of God in the face of Christ is unveiled; and all they, from whose hearts the veil of prejudice, pride, unbelief, and worldly lust is removed, see it clearly and distinctly. If the "unveiled face," be understood of the beholders, this latter veil is meant; and the contrast is between them and the unbelieving Jews: but if it be understood of Christ, then the contrast is between the obscure ministration of Moses, and the clear and full ministration of the apostles. As believers they beheld this glory, (Note, iv. 4—6:) and through their doctrine, by the teaching of the Holy Spirit, all Christians did, and still do, behold it.

CHAP. IV.

The apostle declares his unwearied zeal and integrity in preaching the Gospel, 1, 2. Satan blinds the minds of unbelievers against the light of the divine glory of Christ; which God imparts, by shining into the hearts of his people, 3—6. The weakness and sufferings of the apostle redounded to the praise of the power of God, 7—12. The supports, motives, and prospects of glory, by which he and his helpers were induced to persevere without fainting, 13—18.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

Even the appearance of self-commendation is painful to the humble and spiritual Christian; whereas the proud and carnal court applause, and are highly gratified with it. The conversion of sinners, and their subsequent holy lives, are the minister's best letter of recommendation: if these effects be evident and abundant, he will generally want no other testimonial among real Christians. For his usefulness is manifestly declared, and fully understood, to be Christ's own attestation to his ministry, which the Saviour hath written by the Spirit of the living God upon the hearts of his people, and made legible in their lives and actions. Professors of evangelical truth should remember, that their tempers and conduct are supposed to form an exhibition of the tendency of that doctrine and ministry on which they attend. Indeed, the stamp of much religious profession is a lax practice, self-confidence, boasting loquacity, censoriousness, a disputatious temper, bitterness, and clamour: this epistle often shows under what sort of a ministry it was formed; though it leaves the reader in great doubt whether Christ had any part in it, or whether an enemy alone was concerned. But, alas! many, who attend on the most faithful and practical preachers, exhibit such an epistle, (so to speak,) to the perusal of the church, as has evident marks of spuriousness in it: though numbers charge all the blame on the doctrine and ministry, which are thus disgraced. But when professed Christians act consistently, obeying the commands, and copying the example, of their Lord, they honour and recommend the Gospel and the preachers of it, and are instrumental in bringing others also to attend on the truth without prejudice. Success in this blessed work should inspire our minds with confidence in God: yet we ought always humbly to recollect and acknowledge, that we are not sufficient of ourselves to think any thing as of ourselves; that our whole dependence must be on the Lord, and that the whole glory belongs to him alone. It is a very great honour to be made able ministers of the New Testament. We should not indeed suppose ourselves to be such, in that high sense which the apostle meant: yet, by imbibing his principles, copying his example, and adhering to his doctrine, we may hope that the Lord will, in an inferior degree, qualify us for the same honourable service. Even the New Testament will be a killing letter, if exhibited as a mere system and form, without a dependence on the Spirit of God to give it a quickening energy: yet it is by the blessed doctrine of God our Saviour alone that the Spirit is given to sinful man.

V. 7—18.

The holy law of God, though excellent and glorious in itself, can only be held forth as the ministration of death and condemnation to fallen man: but justifying righteousness and sanctifying grace come from Jesus Christ, and by the ministry of the Gospel. This gracious revelation so far exceeds in glory the holy law itself, that it even seems to eclipse it, as the noon-day sun does the glimmering stars. Much more, then, does the clear light and glory of the Gospel exceed those of all preceding dispensations. May Christians then learn to value the faithful ministry of the Gospel, and encourage their preachers to use great plainness of speech, suited to the doctrine with which they are intrusted! May we read the Scriptures with continual prayer to have the veil removed from our hearts, that we may discover and steadfastly behold the Lord Jesus, as "the End of the law for righteousness to "every believer;" that so we may profit even by those things which are now abolished! May we pray also in behalf of them whose minds are still blinded by pride, prejudice, and unbelief; especially for the poor Jews, who are preserved a living demonstration of the truth of the Scriptures, though themselves utterly unacquainted with their spiritual import! May they speedily be turned to the Lord, and the veil be taken from their hearts! May we always remember that the Lord Jesus is the life and soul, as it were, of the Scriptures and of all true religion; that being One with him, by faith and his indwelling Spirit, we enjoy true liberty in the service of God; and that "beholding with open face, as in a glass, the glory of "the Lord, we are changed into his image from glory to "glory, as by the Lord, the Spirit!" This transformation of the soul into conformity to Christ, is the proper evidence and test of spiritual illumination; and without a measure of it, all supposed discoveries and revelations are mere delusion and enthusiasm. May then all, who are called ministers, have the eyes of their understanding enlightened, to behold in this manner the glorious Object of our faith, hope, love, and imitation; and point him out to others with the same efficacy on their souls also: that so the triune JEHOVAH, Father, Son, and Spirit, may be glorified in all and by all, now and for evermore!

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 2. The apostle having had such a glorious and excellent ministry intrusted to him as had been described, and being sensible of the abundant mercy which had been shown to him in his extraordinary conversion and reconciliation unto God, and his call to the apostleship, did not faint or draw back in a dishonourable manner, because of the difficulties and sufferings which he had to encounter: but he and his fellow-labourers renounced with abhorrence all those artful contrivances, by which the idolatrous priests, or the scribes and priests of the Jews, or corrupt teachers of Christianity, imposed on their followers, served their own dishonourable and dishonest purposes, or concealed their secret crimes. The true servants of Christ did not thus exercise their ministry with craftiness or duplicity, professing one thing and aiming at another and covering avarice, and ambition, or sensual indulgence, under high pretensions to zeal and sanctity. Nor did they deceitfully model their doctrine to suit the prejudices and inclinations of men, for their own selfish ends, by keeping back profitable truths, or making such additions and alterations, as might render their preaching less offensive; or by using ambiguous and obscure language, that their meaning might not be clearly apprehended. On the contrary, they endeavoured to set divine truth before their hearers in the most manifest, convincing, and affecting light, that so their doctrine, ministry, and conduct, might be commended to every man's conscience, even should his heart rise against it; that every one might perceive the truth and importance of their message, and be sensible that both his interest and duty required him to attend to it; and this they did, as in the sight of God, the ever present Witness and Judge of the thoughts and intents of their hearts. 'What reason can 'be assigned why they, who preached the Gospel plainly, 'should write the same things to the same persons obscurely? "Whatsoever things were written of old "time, were written for our learning." (Rom. xv. 4.)— 'And surely they who wrote afterwards by the same Spirit, 'wrote for the same end. And if they wrote for our 'instruction, to be sure they wrote plainly and clearly; 'since otherwise they wrote not so as to instruct and 'teach, but rather to confound the reader. Seeing therefore the great end of writing the Scripture was to instruct 'the world in the will and mind of God, and the great 'things of the Christian faith, their writings are an 'effectual means to obtain it; which yet they cannot be, 'unless they are plain and clear, as to the great things of 'religion.' (Whitby). This was written against the papists, who discourage the reading of the Scripture, because they are obscure, lest the common people should learn heresy from them; and on the same ground rest the claims of the Church to infallibility, and the authority of their traditions. But the reasoning is equally conclusive against all those nominal protestants, who suppose that great learning and skill are needful to understand the Scriptures, especially the apostolical epistles; otherwise conclusions may be drawn from them, which they think heretical.

V. 3, 4. If then, after all, the Gospel, which the apostle preached so plainly, was covered with a veil, (as the Mosaic law had been,) if its truth, nature, and glory, were hidden from any who heard it, such persons were evidently as yet in a lost estate, and in the most imminent danger of final predition; and the veil must be upon their hearts, through the prevalence of pride, prejudice, and ungodly lusts. For Satan, the god of this world, whom all unconverted men worshipped and served, in one way or other, prevailed to blind the understandings of numbers who heard the Gospel, and disbelieved it through love of sin and pride of heart; that so the "light of "the Gospel of the glory of Christ," (as the words most literally signify,) even the light which exhibits so clearly the glory of Christ as the Image of God, representing and displaying all divine perfections harmoniously exercised in his character and salvation, might not shine upon them, or within them. Vast multitudes of Satan's subjects are kept from hearing the Gospel; others hear, and for a time are blinded by the tempter to oppose or reject it: and his grand design is, at any rate or by any means, to keep out this transforming light; yet many, who for a season were blinded, have been at length converted. But among the number of unbelievers, the enemy is permitted, in awful judgment, to blind many to their perdition; and this was peculiarly to be expected by those who closed their eyes to this light, when apostles were the preachers, and their doctrine was confirmed by evident and multiplied miracles. (Marg. Ref.) 'The fault is not in us, or in the ob'scurity of the Gospel, but in their own blindness, for 'we hide nothing from them.' (Whitby.) It is most astonishing, that many of the ancient Christian writers understood the true God to be meant by "the god of "this world:" and it also shows, that their authority, as expositors of Scripture, is not implicitly to be depended on; and that the reformers from popery, who conceded to join the fathers of the first four centuries with the Scriptures, in stating and defending their doctrine, did not act with their usual judgment, but greatly embarrassed the cause which they most zealously maintained. Image, &c. (Note, Col. i. 15—17. Marg. Ref.)

V. 5, 6. The peculiarity of the apostle's ministry, and that of his faithful associates, was this: they preached not themselves, they did not seek to exalt or enrich themselves, they did not aspire after authority, reputation, or any secular pre-eminence; but they preached Christ Jesus as their great Subject, in respect of his Person and salvation; they endeavoured to exalt and glorify him; they declared him to be the Lord of the Church, and the Lord of all; and they called on men to accept of his salvation, submit to his authority, and become his obedient servants. But, as to themselves, they not only were fellow-subjects to the common Lord of all Christians, but they were the willing servants of the Church for Christ's sake; they declared that they were bound readily to labour, venture, suffer, and submit to the deepest debasement in doing good to men, as far as the glory of Christ could be advanced by it, or his command required it. This zeal to glorify their beloved Lord made them earnest to be understood in their preaching, which ought to have recommended them to all Christians, in proportion as it excited the enmity and opposition of Satan and his servants. They were induced and enabled to act in this manner by what they had themselves experienced; for they too might have been blinded by the god of this world, and for a time were in an awful state of opposition to the light of the glorious Gospel; but at length, "That GOD, who," in the creation of the world, "commanded light to spring forth out of darkness," had, of his sovereign mercy, effected a similar change in their souls, where ignorance, error, sin, and misery, had before prevailed. By his new-creating Spirit he had removed all obstacles, and let the light of divine truth shine into their hearts; having prepared the understanding to admit, and the heart to love, the doctrine of the Gospel. Thus had he given them the illumination of that knowledge of the divine glory, which their faith perceived in the face of Jesus Christ, in his Person, miracles, character, righteousness, atonement, and mediation; and which, being thus steadfastly beheld with open face as in a mirror, transformed the soul into the glorious image of God exhibited in it. The apostle seems especially to have adverted to his own extraordinary conversion; yet he evidently meant to include that of all other faithful ministers and true believers, which is similar in its nature and effects, and wrought by the same divine power, though it be not attended by the same miraculous circumstances. Satan blinds men's minds, lest the light of the Gospel should make known to them the glory of Christ; but God enlightens the minds of his chosen people, that they may behold that glory; so that this seems the grand distinction between those whom Satan blinds, and those whom God the Spirit illuminates. Face. 'The apostle 'continually alludes to the face of Moses, which was 'not uncovered, (that the image of God might be clear,) 'but covered.' (Beza.) 'The face of Moses gave a feeble and transient reflection of the glory of God, which was covered with a veil; but the face of Christ, the Image of God, displays it fully and permanently to those who are divinely illuminated. "The light of the Gospel of the "glory of Christ," (4.) and "the light of the knowledge "of the glory of God," are spoken of as the same; for "Christ and the Father are One."

V. 7. This treasure, (even the light of the know"ledge of the glory of God, in the face of Christ," and that important ministry which related to it,) was, as it were, deposited in earthen vessels, (Notes, Judg. vii. 16—22.) (Marg. Ref.) Even the apostles and most eminent evangelists were sinners by nature and practice; their bodies were frail and mortal as those of other men; liable to the same infirmities, susceptible of pain and suffering, and easily worn down by fatigue and hardship, or pinched with hunger and cold; nor were their minds less susceptible of fear, sorrow, anxiety, and disquietude, than those of others. They were also conscious of many defects and impediments, and destitute of those accomplishments which the world generally admires; they had no wealth or authority, they made no show of superior genius, learning, or eloquence; nay, they were not delivered from the effects of in-dwelling sin. So far therefore were they from being such illustrious persons as to attract general admiration, that they were treated as the filth of the world; and, while their infirmities sometimes rendered them less acceptable even to the churches, their stripes and imprisonments increased the contempt with which the proud and self-wise beheld them. This was appointed by God for most important purposes. He could have commissioned angels to proclaim the glorious doctrine of the Gospel, or he could have put this treasure into more splendid vessels, by sending the most eminent and admired of the sons of men to instruct the nations; but his plan was, that the superior energy of the Gospel, and the wonderful effects produced by it, should evidently appear to be wholly owing to the excellency of his power, as working by that doctrine; and not at all to be ascribed to the superior endowments of the person whom he employed. For this end he chose mean brittle vessels, by which to convey this treasure to mankind, that his power might be glorified in their preservation, and in the blessed change wrought amongst mankind by their ministry.

V. 8—12. It was very suitable to the apostle's design, of re-establishing himself in the affections of the Corinthians, to remind them of his sufferings and supports in that ministry, from which they had received such unspeakable advantage. He, and other faithful ministers, were "troubled on every side," in every place, from persons of every description, and with all kinds of afflictions; yet were they "not distressed" or straitened, as men who had no way of escape or relief. They were "perplexed" with difficulties, about what course they should take, and how they should endure amidst such multiplied trials; yet they were not left to "despair" of help and comfort. They were "persecuted" wherever they went; yet the Lord did not forsake them, or permit their enemies to prevail against them. Nay, they were even cast down in the conflict with temptation and persecution; yet they were not destroyed, but were enabled to rise up again, and to renew the fight, without any material damage to themselves or the cause. Thus they carried about with them in their bodies the dying of the Lord Jesus, in those bruises, wounds, and stripes, which they received for his sake, and from such men as had crucified him; that so the life of Jesus, as risen and glorified, might be evidently proved, by the protection, deliverances, supports, and consolations, afforded to them, which enabled them to proceed with constancy and fortitude in their ministry, amidst these complicated dangers and sufferings. For, while some of their brethren had sealed their testimony with their blood, they, who still lived, were continually delivered to death, in the persecutions which every where met them; that so the power of their ever-living Saviour might be manifested, in still preserving their mortal flesh in life and fitness for service. So that death was, as it were, continually at work on them, by the hardships which they endured in conformity to the death of Christ: but life was wrought in the souls of the Corinthians by means of their sufferings, as they were not only exempted from persecutions, but were made partakers of spiritual and eternal life by their ministry. And did it then become them to augment the trials of their pastors, by their neglect and disaffection? 'While you are called to live for his honour, we may be said to serve our Redeemer, by bearing for his sake repeated deaths.' (Doddridge.)

CHAP. V.

The apostle declares, that the assured hope and earnest desire of being present with the Lord, when absent from the body, rendered him indifferent as to this life, 1—8: that he laboured to approve himself to Christ, in the prospect of a future judgment, 9, 10; knowing the terrors, of which he conscientiously persuaded men, 11: that this was said, not as boasting, but to furnish the Corinthians with an answer to false pretenders, 12: that the

V. 13—18. The apostle and his fellow-sufferers persevered in their ministry, because they were actuated by the same spirit of faith which the Psalmist had expressed, when, amidst imminent dangers and distressing difficulties, he had declared his confidence, that God, according to his promise, would deliver him out of them all. (Note, Ps. cxvi. 10, 11.) They believed most firmly the doctrines which they preached, and therefore nothing could induce them to conceal, retract, or corrupt them. In the daily expectation and anticipation of martyrdom, they were fully assured that God would raise their mangled bodies from the grave by the powerful work of Jesus, even as he had raised him from the dead; and that he would thus present them, with all those to whom their labours had been blessed, before his glorious throne, as the objects of his love, whom he at length had made perfect in glory and felicity. They also understood, that all their sufferings, as well as their ministerial endowments, were intended to subserve the Lord's purposes of love to their brethren, (as indeed all things were ordered in that manner, which might best promote their eternal good,) that the abundant mercy and grace vouchsafed to them, might excite vast numbers to thank God for the benefit received by their means, and so conduce to his glory also. With these prospects and hopes, they were preserved from fainting, or declining the dangers and difficulties attending on their ministry. For, "though their outward man perished," their bodies were worn out by fatigue and sufferings, and their lives destroyed by repeated violences, yet their "inward man," or their souls as regenerate, daily became stronger in faith, hope, love, patience, &c. and were renewed more and more into the holy image of God. They therefore considered their various trials to be "light affliction," which ought scarcely to be mentioned, being as nothing, when compared with the end which they had in view; and the continuance of their sufferings, (though for many years,) was but for a moment, when contrasted with eternity. Moreover, they knew, by faith and experience, that these afflictions were working out for them an increase of future and eternal felicity; both as means by which their souls were made partakers of the holiness of God, and rendered more capable of spiritual enjoyment, and as he would graciously and abundantly recompense those sufferings which they endured for his sake. (Marg. Ref.) The words here used are far more emphatical than any translation of them can be. There is a repetition of the word hyperbole, by which is generally meant a person's exceeding the limits of exact truth, in any animated description or narration; but in the subject, on which the apostle spoke, the boldest figures of speech must come short of the mark. If a man proceeded from one apparent hyperbole to another, and accumulated the most energetic terms as much as possible, he could not fully express the real excellency of that glory, honour, and immortality, in which the believer's sufferings would assuredly terminate. Compared with it, all temporal afflictions were levity itself, a momentary lightness of affliction; and earthly prosperity mere vanity and emptiness. This glory was substantial, weighty, durable, exceeding description and imagination, and human language must labour in vain to convey any suitable ideas of it. It would even have been an insupportable weight to them, until their bodies and souls were prepared by Omnipotence to sustain it. It was "a weight of glory," a fulness of God, a measure of knowledge, holiness, dignity, and felicity, in his favour, presence, and according to his glorious excellency and beauty, adequate to whatever they should be made capable of possessing and enjoying, and all this would be unchangeable and eternal. In this prospect the apostle and his brethren disregarded visible and sensible objects, they did not aim at worldly honours and advantages, they looked not at them with estimation or desire, but by faith they beheld, and in hope they sought, invisible glories as their great object; being assured that all visible and sensible things, whether pleasant or painful, the good or the evil things of the world, were temporal, and would speedily be terminated; whereas the unseen objects which faith realized were eternal, whether the final happiness of believers, or the final misery of the wicked, were intended; and this gave such an incomparable importance in their judgment to unseen things, that nothing else seemed worthy of their desires or of their fears. 'What an influence St. Paul's Hebrew 'had upon his Greek is every-where visible. Cabad in 'Hebrew signifies to be heavy, and to be glorious. St. 'Paul in the Greek joins them, and says, weight of glory.' (Locke.) That the writers of the New Testament frequently hebraise, so to speak, is manifest; but whether this might not in some cases be intentional may be questioned. Even the copious Greek, as found in Pagan writers, could not have expressed, in full energy, the apostle's exalted conceptions, without some of those sublime allusions and metaphors, which are found only in the Hebrew Scriptures, and in the New Testament.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

They are not meet for the sacred ministry of the New Testament, who do not expect the salvation of their own souls from the free mercy of God through Jesus Christ. If we have received this mercy, or have a prevailing hope of it, we should not faint under any tribulations, while employed to recommend it to our fellow-sinners. Indeed, divine grace will teach faithful ministers "to renounce "the hidden things of dishonesty;" they will not walk "in craftiness, nor handle the word of God deceitfully;" and if any, who are artfully imposing on men for their own credit or profit, suppose themselves partakers of the saving love of Christ constrained him to devoted obedience, and made him dead to all other regards, 13—16: that all in Christ are new creatures, 17: that God, in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself, had reconciled him and other preachers, and had committed to them the ministry of reconciliation, 18, 19: and that as ambassadors, they, in the stead of Christ, besought men to be reconciled to God, through his righteousness and atonement, 20, 21.

mercy of Christ, they are as much deceived by Satan as others can be by them. For the minister of Christ must avoid all appearances of duplicity; he must neither pay court to any man's passions, nor connive at his vices: but he ought, in the most perspicuous and intelligible manner, to declare and apply the truth, and so to commend himself to every man's conscience as in the sight of God. If the Gospel, when thus preached, be hidden from the hearers, it is evident that they are still in the way of destruction: and they have reason to dread the consequences of their obstinate unbelief, as it is among such persons, especially, that Satan, the usurping god of this world, is permitted finally to blind and harden numbers to their ruin. His great object is, to keep men in the dark: particularly to keep out of their minds "the light of the Gospel of the "glory of Christ;" he therefore spares no pains to keep them at a distance from faithful preaching, or by various prejudices to set them against it, or by manifold corruptions to destroy its efficacy. His grand opposition is always made to the personal and mediatorial glory of Christ; for he knows, that no other knowledge, or religious observances, will sanctify or save those on whom this divine light doth not shine: and that none can perish who are illuminated by it. But, though many are blinded, the minister must go on with his work; he must not preach himself, either as the subject or the object of his discourses; but he must "preach Christ Jesus, the Lord;" dwelling on his love and salvation as his favourite theme, and seeking his glory as the great end of his labours: and, instead of aspiring to pre-eminence and authority, he should willingly be the servant of the disciples of Christ, for his sake, and stoop to any thing that may promote their good. Indeed, this will be the disposition of all those, into whose hearts God hath shined by his new-creating Spirit, to give them "the light of his glory, in "the face of Jesus Christ." In proportion to the degree of our spiritual illumination, we shall reflect the image of Christ, even as he is to us the Image of the invisible God; and we shall learn lowliness, self-denial, and love, from that admired pattern. But without this illumination the soul remains a dark, confused, and deformed chaos, when science hath done its utmost; nor can that knowledge of God and of Christ, "which is eternal life," be obtained in any other way. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 7—12.

The Lord puts the treasure of heavenly truth into mean earthen vessels; he often employs persons of such infirm bodies, moderate abilities, or low rank in society, as worldly policy would reject and despise; for, whatever instrument be selected, he will make it appear, that the "excellency of the power," by which the Gospel is made successful, "is of God, and not of men." He therefore uses various methods to convince his most useful servants of their weakness and insufficiency; and sometimes he makes their infirmities visible to others, that they may not give them undue honour and respect. These earthen pitchers are very brittle; but the rich treasure they contain is often most manifest when they are most exposed; and when they are broken to pieces, it is sometimes more abundantly communicated than it was before. In one way or other both Christians and ministers must be troubled; and sometimes it will be on every side. Yet faith and grace will preserve them from deep distress. They may be perplexed by various difficulties and complicated discouragements; yet they will be preserved from utter despair; the Lord will not forsake them in their persecutions and temptations. Even when cast down by their enemies, they shall not be destroyed; for he will lift them up again, and enable them to renew the combat. But the troubles and sins of ungodly men, as well as their temporal prosperity, will terminate in everlasting darkness and despair. It is indeed a great honour, though painful to nature, always to bear about with us the dying of the Lord Jesus, by suffering for his sake and after his example, from the contempt and enmity of this evil world; and he will show his life and power, by supporting and comforting those who are thus tried and exposed in his cause. Indeed, if we by faith are interested in our dying Redeemer, and conformed to him in outward troubles, and the crucifixion of the flesh, we shall, in hope, comfort, holiness of life, and constancy in his service, abundantly manifest his power and truth, as risen and glorified: and, as far as we resemble him, we shall be willing and thankful for death to work in us, that life may be given to others by our means.

V. 13—18.

Nothing can be done in the spiritual warfare, without the same Spirit of faith which animated the ancient prophets, apostles, and martyrs of Jesus: we shall be timid, hesitating, and wavering in our testimony, unless we can say, "I believe, and therefore have I spoken." But when we are fully assured of the truth, importance, and excellency of the Gospel, nothing can durably prevail with us to retract, alter, or conceal, the great doctrines, which we are called to preach or profess. Yet true religion does not require us to neglect our real interest: it assures us, that he who raised up the Lord Jesus will also raise up all his faithful followers, and present them before the assembled world, as those who have honoured him, and whom he will honour. Knowing, therefore, "that all "things work together for good to those who love God;" giving diligence to obtain the assurance that we are of this number; and being animated by the hope, that our labours and trials will conduce to the benefit of our brethren and the glory of the Lord; we shall not faint in our work and warfare. Even when our bodies waste away by disease, wear out by labour, grow feeble through old age, or are about to perish by persecution and death, the soul may be renewed and grow more vigorous and holy day by day; and more ripe for the enjoyment of heavenly felicity. But if the apostle could call his heavy and long continued trials "light affliction, and but for a moment," what must our trifling difficulties appear in the estimate of faith and grace! How shameful then is it, that we should complain or despond under them! What powerful supports and consolations must there be in the hope and earnest of heaven, beyond what we have hitherto experienced! May we then seek to have all our light and momentary afflictions sanctified to us, that, by promoting our humility, spirituality, and admiring love of God our Saviour, they may "work "for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory!" We know not indeed what we shall be, but the unutterable nature of the felicity which we are encouraged to expect, should enhance our value of it. That must be little, which human language can express, or human imagination conceive; but the joys of heaven will be immense and everlasting. On the other hand, what must be the weight of that misery reserved for the wicked, concerning which the Scriptures use the most energetic language; when all the sufferings that a man is here exposed to are light and momentary, according to the judgment of the inspired writers! Let us then look off from the things which are seen; let us cease to seek for worldly advantages, or to fear present distresses; let us take warning to flee from the wrath to come, and give diligence to ensure future felicity; for "the things which "are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen "are eternal."

NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 1—4. The apostle, continuing the argument of the preceding chapter, stated, that he and other faithful ministers endured persecution, from the assurance of a far happier state, whenever they should be cut off by death. The body might be deemed "an earthly "house," in which the soul dwelt on earth, and which would soon "return to the dust whence it was taken:" yet it was rather a tabernacle, the unsettled and precarious abode of a few days, than a stated residence. This house, or tabernacle, was about to be taken down, and the materials of it to be dissolved; but when that change should take place, the soul being released from a mean mouldering tenement, which continually needed repairs, and had been a constant source of trouble, sorrow, temptation, and sin, would immediately have a building of God, a habitation far superior to all that ever was made with hands, a blessed mansion in the heavens, where God displays his glorious presence, and where light, purity, and felicity, are found in full perfection: and this mansion would continue to all eternity. As the apostle spake of what was to follow immediately upon the dissolution of the body by death, he must be supposed to mean the state of the immortal soul, before, as well as after, the resurrection; for the language is figurative, and must not be confined by a too literal interpretation. In this prospect, he and his brethren groaned earnestly desiring to be delivered from their present troubles, and to be clothed with that glory, felicity, and immortality, which might be considered as the garment, as well as the mansion, of the blessed inhabitants of heaven. This he seems to have longed for, and desired to possess, without passing through death, if it might have been so. He, however, knew, that seeing they should be thus arrayed, they would not be found naked or destitute, when they left this world, and all its possessions and accommodations; nor would they experience trouble, want, shame, or any inconvenience, for evermore. This then must be a most desirable change: for while they were in the frail tabernacle of the body, they groaned, being burdened with manifold trials, temptations, and difficulties, from which they longed to be released. Not that they desired to be unclothed, by putting off the body at death, merely in order to be rid of its incumbrance: the prospect of that dissolution was not in itself pleasing to them: but they would rather have been "clothed upon," by being taken immediately to heaven, as Enoch and Elijah were, that mortality might at once have been swallowed up and lost in life and immortality; yet the prospect of the consequences of death, and the hope of a future resurrection, reconciled them even to the pangs of the separating stroke. The passage, being expressed in metaphors unusually bold, is indeed rather difficult; yet the above seems the evident meaning of it. Nor does it appear that the apostle intended to express any expectation that the day of judgment, and the general resurrection, were at hand; or to determine any thing concerning the manner, as to external form, in which the soul subsists, either before or after that solemn season. The word naked, may allude to Adam and Eve, after they had eaten the forbidden fruit, and lost the robe of innocency; whereas believers, being "made the righteousness of God in "Christ," will not be thus found naked, in whatever manner they leave this world.

V. 5—8. That change of the judgment and affections, by which the apostle and his brethren had been wrought and fashioned into a fitness for their perilous and suffering employments, and to that willingness to die for Christ's sake, in the assurance of going to enjoy felicity in his favour, was the work of God himself, and could have been effected by no other agent. They had also received the earnest of the Spirit, in his sanctifying joys and consolations; so that they could not possibly be deceived in this respect. (Note, i. 22.) They were therefore always confident of the divine favour, and courageous in their work, though exposed to the daily peril of a violent death: for they well knew, that, whilst they sojourned in the body, they must be excluded from the immediate presence of the Lord Jesus, as pilgrims in a distant land. For they then lived and laboured by faith in him, as invisibly present with them and taking care of them; which afforded them support and encouragement suited to the present state; yet it differed very much indeed from that intuitive vision of his glory and felicity in his immediate presence, which was the object of their hopes and desires. This faith, however, inspired them with confidence and courage; as they were satisfied, that whenever their bodies should be worn out by labours, or endure martyrdom, their souls, being dislodged from that tenement, would immediately be admitted into the presence of their beloved Lord. This is absolutely decisive concerning the felicity to be enjoyed by the souls of believers, when "absent from the body;" and it also shows that they will possess their happiness in the very place, where Jesus displays his glorious presence. The word home, (6,) seems not well chosen. This world is not the believer's home, but the place of sojourning and pilgrimage; and his body the tabernacle, in which he sojourns.

V. 9—12. In this hope, the apostle and his fellow-labourers were ambitious, (so the word properly signifies,) 'and it is flat to translate it,' "We labour:" (Doddridge.) They were ambitious, not of the honours and applause of the world, but of acceptance with the Lord, in respect of their persons, ministry, and labours; though they should be unacceptable to mankind, or even to their brethren: that so they might be supported by the comforts and consciousness of his approbation, during their sojourning in the body while absent from him; and that, when they should quit the body, they might be welcomed by him as good and faithful servants, and be admitted to the joy of their Lord. For they were assured that they, their hearers, and all men, without exception, must necessarily, whether they would or not, appear, or be made manifest, in the whole of their true characters, with all the secrets of their hearts and lives, before the solemn and decisive tribunal of Christ, the righteous, impartial, holy, heart-searching, omnipotent Judge; who now called on them to trust in him and obey him as a divine Saviour, but who would surely take vengeance on all who rejected or abused his salvation. At this solemn period, every individual shall receive the appointed recompense of his deeds, according to the things done while he sojourned in the body, or by and through the body, whether they were good or evil, without any respect of persons, or regard to profession, or other distinctions. So that the justified believer, who, from love to Christ hath done good, uprightly and faithfully, will receive an abundant and gracious recompense of his believing, though imperfect, services: but the profligate, the infidel, the Pharisee, the hypocrite, and apostate, with all kinds of impenitent transgressors, will be punished according to the number and aggravation of their crimes. Knowing therefore what a terrible vengeance the Lord would then execute on the workers of iniquity, the apostle and his brethren used every kind of argument and persuasion to induce men, of every nation and description, to believe in the Lord Jesus, and to act consistently with the character of his disciples. In this their earnest endeavour, the motives and intentions of their hearts had already been manifested to God, and judged by him: and they were confident of his gracious approbation: and whatever the prejudices and passions of some at Corinth might suggest, the apostle was confident, that in their consciences they were convinced that he and his helpers acted with integrity, zeal, and faithful affection to their souls. Not that they needed or intended again to commend themselves to favour, from selfish or vain-glorious motives; but they thus suggested such things, as were proper to be opposed to the censures and suspicions of false teachers, and gave the people occasion to glory in the disinterested labours and patient sufferings of their faithful ministers; and so to answer the boastings of those ambitious men, who gloried, in appearance, as if very zealous in the cause of Christ, and greatly 13 For whether [i] we be beside ourselves, [k] it is to God: or whether we be [l] sober, it is [m] for your cause.

14 For [n] the love of Christ [o] constraineth us; [p] because we thus judge, that if [q] one died for all, [r] then were all dead:

15 And that he died for all, [s] that they which live, should not [t] henceforth [u] live unto themselves, but unto him which died for them, and rose again.

16 Wherefore, henceforth [x] know we no man after the flesh: yea, though we have known Christ after the flesh, [y] yet now henceforth know we him no more.

17 Therefore if any man [z] be in Christ, * he is [a] a new creature: [b] old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new.

attached to the Corinthians, but who were not really what they professed, and whose hearts dissented from, and, as it were, belied the language of their mouths.

V. 13—15. The great earnestness of the apostle to rectify the disorders at Corinth, and to re-establish his authority among them, his lively affections, and his excessive labours amidst sufferings and dangers, gave his adversaries occasion to represent him as "beside himself," and transported by a vehement zeal, beyond all the dictates of reason and sobriety. (Marg. Ref.) But, whatever in his conduct had given them this opinion of him, it was wholly owing to his zeal for the honour of God and his truth, and to his earnest desire to approve himself faithful in his cause; and when at other times he seemed to act with great moderation and candour, and to debate matters with coolness and sobriety, it was wholly from a regard to their welfare, and a desire to recover them from dangerous errors; in order to which he employed every method that he could devise, without regarding their censures or any personal consequences. For in this, as well as in other things, the love of Christ constrained him and other faithful ministers and real Christians. The love which Jesus had manifested towards sinners, in the great work of redemption, and to believers, in calling them to partake of this inestimable blessing, had excited in their hearts such reciprocal love and gratitude to him, as constrained them, and carried them on with invincible energy, in every service, by which they could glorify his name or promote his cause; nor could other fears, hopes, affections, or interests, stop their progress, when actuated by this most powerful principle. For in this matter, they judged decidedly, in the most cool and reflecting moments, that, if Jesus died as an atoning Sacrifice for all that should ever believe in him, then were all men dead, as under condemnation, enslaved to sin, and utterly destitute of power to deliver themselves; otherwise he needed not to have died for them, or in their stead. And that he died, as a common sacrifice for the sins of all men, or men of every nation and description, that when, through the preaching of his Gospel to sinners, any of them were quickened and pardoned, and so passed from death to life, they should from that memorable period no longer live according to their carnal inclinations, or to seek their own interest, reputation, indulgence, or advancement, as they had formerly done; but should devote themselves, and all their powers, to do the will of the Redeemer, to promote his glory, and to recommend his Gospel; seeing he had died for them, and risen again, to be their Lord and King.

V. 16. The apostle and his associates, therefore, being under such obligations, influenced by such motives, and encouraged by such hopes and assurances of assistance as had been stated, were powerfully impelled to disregard all contrary and interfering objects, that they might show their love to their most gracious Lord and Saviour. So that when this change had taken place, and these principles were matured, they "knew no man after the "flesh;" they had no respect to men's persons, because of nation, sect, rank, or personal attachment, when their obedience to Christ was concerned; they could not accommodate their doctrine or conduct to the humours of men, from any worldly principles, or because of outward connexions with them, or obligations to them. Nay, they did not now regard their external relation to Christ himself, as being of the same nation with him, or otherwise acquainted with him. Even such of the apostles and evangelists, as had personally known him, or been nearly related to him, did in this respect disregard that external tie, when it came in competition with their union with him as believers, and their obedience to him as his servants and ministers. They could not warp their doctrine or deviate from their instructions, to please the Jews, or the nearest relatives of Christ, any more than out of respect to their own friends, or to the philosophers and princes of the Gentiles. Many suppose that the apostle here referred to the Jewish converts, who were displeased with him for admitting the Gentiles into the Church, and being earnest for their conversion, which they deemed a kind of madness: (13:) but the Corinthians were chiefly Gentile converts, and they do not seem to have been generally disposed to judaize.

V. 17. The judgment, experience, and principles, which the apostle had stated, should not be regarded as peculiar to himself, but as the standard of genuine Christianity: therefore if any man, whether Jew or Gentile, was "in Christ," as a justified believer, he was also "a "new creature," or a new creation of God; for the marginal reading, "let him be a new creature," does not accord to the rest of the verse, "Old things are passed "away," or "have passed away," &c. By spiritual illumination, and its invariable effects, a new judgment had been produced, with new inclinations, affections, and purposes, from which new words and actions must proceed.

18 And [c] all things are of God, [d] who hath reconciled us to himself by Jesus Christ, and [e] hath given to us the ministry of reconciliation;

19 To wit, that [f] God was in Christ, [g] reconciling the world unto himself, [h] not imputing their trespasses unto them; and hath * committed unto us [i] the word of reconciliation.

Thus old desires, intentions, expectations, connexions, and satisfactions, passed away and were superseded; for behold, by the marvellous operation of divine grace, all things were become new! So that the Christian experienced new hopes and fears, joys and sorrows, desires and aversions; he learned to speak a new language, to choose new companions, to aim at new objects, and to attend to new employments. Every thing was now cast into a new mould, received a new impression, and took a new direction from the knowledge of God, faith in Christ, and love to him, humiliation for sin, and hatred of it, the desire of holiness, and the hope of eternal life.

V. 18—21. As this change was wrought by the power, and according to the purpose of God, so it bore on it the stamp of his holy image, and led to a proper temper of mind and conduct towards him. Thus he had reconciled the apostle and his brethren to himself by Jesus Christ, the great Mediator; and, having pardoned their rebellions, subdued their enmity, and "shed abroad his love in their "hearts," he had intrusted to them "the ministry of "reconciliation:" that from gratitude to him, zeal for his glory, and benevolence to their fellow-sinners, they might spend their future lives in earnest and unwearied endeavours to bring others to partake of the same mercy, and to devote themselves in love to the service of their reconciled God. This ministry implied that "God was "in Christ," "manifest in the flesh;" as the fulness of the Deity dwelt in, and was displayed by, the human nature, through the incarnation of the eternal Word and Son of God, who was equal to, and one with the Father: that so, being united to man's nature, he might reconcile the world unto himself, by his atonement, mediation, and grace; and that sinners throughout the earth, of every nation and description, might thus be encouraged to hope in his mercy, and taught by his grace to love his holy character, law, worship, and service, to which their carnal minds had before been enmity. When therefore sinners were brought to him, as "in Christ reconciling "the world to himself," in humble faith, he no more imputed any of their trespasses unto them, but blotted them out by a free forgiveness. This word or doctrine of reconciliation he had committed to those, who had once been enemies, but who had thus been reconciled. So that they were now commissioned, as ambassadors for Christ, to go in his name and by his authority, and declare these encouraging truths to sinners in every part of the world. And they were not only instructed to command them to repent and believe the Gospel, and to exhort, persuade, and encourage them to hope in the rich mercy of God through Jesus Christ; but God did, as it were, beseech men by them, as the ambassadors of Christ; and they, "in Christ's stead," most earnestly entreated them not to reject such astonishing love, but to repent, submit to God, accept his salvation, and be reconciled to him, as his worshippers, friends, and children. For it must be certain, that he was really willing to be thus reconciled to all who accepted this invitation, seeing that "He," even God the Father, "had made Him," his incarnate Son, "who "knew no sin," but was most perfectly holy and righteous, "to be sin," or a sin-offering, "for us," who deserved the utmost severity of his vengeance. So that this holy and divine Saviour, being perfectly willing to suffer as a sacrifice, was dealt with as if he had been altogether a sinner; that thus God's hatred of sin, and his determination to punish it, being so wonderfully displayed, he might honourably pardon every believer, and make him "the righteousness of God in Christ;" dealing with him as if he had been perfectly righteous, or righteousness itself, yea, as "the righteousness of God in Christ;" as a far nobler and more excellent righteousness was thus made his for justification, than any mere creature could ever have performed. (Marg. Ref.) This verse contains most conclusive arguments, in proof of the vicarious sufferings of Christ, as the satisfactory atonement to divine justice for our sins; of the imputation of his perfect righteousness to believers, as their title to eternal life; and of his real Deity, whose righteousness becomes theirs for justification, by virtue of their union with him. Perhaps stronger language cannot be used, in declaring these doctrines, by those who most zealously contend for them. The same preposition, (υπερ,) here used, is translated instead in the preceding verse; "in Christ's" stead, or instead of Christ. Thus he suffered instead of us! (1 Pet. iii. 18.) The apostle doubtless spoke primarily of himself and his fellow-labourers, as Christ's ambassadors, yet, as all faithful ministers are intrusted with the same message, by the same authority, so they too are ambassadors for Christ, though to a smaller number of their fellow-sinners. Some of the professed Christians at Corinth were supposed by Paul to be unconverted, and unreconciled to God; and he might have them in view, when he spake of God's beseeching sinners by his ministers. But he was evidently giving an account of his commission and general ministry through the nations of the earth: wherever he came, he addressed sinners in this pathetic and earnest manner; and while "he prayed them in Christ's stead to be "reconciled to God," it was as if God himself had besought them to lay aside their enmity, and accept of his mercy.

CHAP. VI.

The apostle earnestly exhorts the Corinthians not to receive the grace of God in vain, but to seek salvation without delay, 1, 2. He shows in what manner he, and his brethren, approved their ministry, 3—10. He tells them, that he spake of this the more freely, out of the great love which he bore to them, 11, 12; requiring the like affection from them, 13. He warns them against intimate connexions with unbelievers, as Christians are the temples of the living God, 14—16; and encourages them by the promises of being received as the children of God, to separate from sinners and from sin, 17, 18.

The change of the language, "ambassadors for Christ," "God beseeches you; we pray you in Christ's stead," &c. shows how familiar it was to the apostle to consider his divine Master as One with the Father, in Deity and authority.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

It is most animating for us to know, amidst our sufferings, temptations, conflicts, and prospects of mortality, that whenever we die we shall enter into the heavens, and be admitted to an unspeakable felicity: but our assurance or prevailing hope of this must be proportioned to the evidence of our conversion. It is not worth while to be very solicitous about, or indulgent to, this clay-cottage, in which the soul is now incommodiously lodged, or rather imprisoned because of transgression. We should not be troubled to feel it, as it were, shake, or to perceive the tokens of its approaching dissolution. We must not expect ease or satisfaction in "this earthly house of our tabernacle;" but we should look forward in hopes of "a building of God, a "house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." While we groan, earnestly desiring admission into this blessed mansion, let us seek to be more and more "clothed "upon" with the robes of righteousness and salvation; thus we may be sure that we shall not be found naked, when dislodged from the body. If in the mean time we groan, being burdened with manifold tribulations and temptations; or if we feel a reluctance to be stripped by the cold rude hand of death, and could rather wish to pass to heaven some other way, "that mortality might be swallowed up of life;" it may encourage us to recollect, that even apostles experienced the same troubles, and knew something of the same reluctance. But if the desire of having done with sin and sorrow, and especially of beholding face to face our beloved Redeemer, hath given us, in a measure, a victory over our fears, and made us willing even "to be absent from the body, that we may be present "with the Lord;" we should remember that it is God himself, who hath wrought our hearts into this spiritual and holy disposition; and that these desires and affections are indeed "the earnest of the Spirit," and the first-fruits of our eternal happiness. This should excite us to an unremitted courage and confidence in our duty, whatever dangers may obstruct our course: while absent from the Lord, we may by faith walk with him, and derive support and consolation from him; for thus we may see him who is invisible, and realize those objects that are unseen: and whatever hastens our departure from the body, shortens also our passage to the presence of our Lord, where is fulness of joy for evermore.

V. 9—13.

While others labour for worldly riches, and are ambitious of the honour that cometh from man, let us aspire after the glory of being accepted by Christ, in all our services during life, and of being received into his joy when we leave the world. As we must all appear without disguise before his judgment-seat, let us beware of hypocrisy, and be impartial in judging ourselves; and especially let us carefully acquaint ourselves with him, as our Saviour, who will shortly be manifested as our Judge; that by his grace we may henceforth do those good things, which he will recompense, as the fruits and evidences of saving faith, in that solemn decisive day. This expectation should also render ministers unwearied and faithful in their work: and, knowing what a tremendous day it will be to all the workers of iniquity, they should be the more earnest and affectionate in their persuasions and warnings to sinners, to seek salvation before it be too late. Happy are they, who are warranted to appeal to God, in respect of their faithfulness and zeal in this good work; and even to the consciences of those who are offended with their plain-dealing. This may sometimes be necessary, though men may censure it as self-commendation: and it is often useful to suggest to the people such things, as are proper to be spoken in defence of the truth and in behalf of faithful preachers, that they may know how to answer the cavils and boastings of such as glory in appearance, but are not hearty in the cause of God.

V. 14—17.

If earnestness to prevent the delusion and destruction of our fellow-sinners, and in the great concerns of the eternal world, bring upon us the charge of being "beside "ourselves;" we need only inquire, whether our conduct be warranted by the word of God, and spring from a regard to his authority and glory; and whether our most vehement affections and addresses, as well as our more cool and temperate reasonings, are indeed intended to promote the salvation of souls. If this be the case, we may venture to disregard the contumely; and we should pray for our revilers, that they may indeed come to themselves, and be delivered from that real insanity, with which all unbelievers are affected. If our judgment, concerning our lost estate as sinners, and the love of Christ as dying for our salvation, coincides with that of the apostle, we shall feel, WE then, as [a] workers together with him, [b] beseech you also, that [c] ye receive not [d] the grace of God in vain.

2 (For he saith, I have heard thee in [e] a time accepted, and in the day of salvation have I succoured thee: behold, now is the accepted time; behold, now is the day of salvation.)

in proportion to our faith and hope, the constraining influence of his love, powerfully exciting us to live to him who died for us, and rose again. But, alas! many show the worthlessness of their professed faith and love, by living to themselves and to the world; and our views are often so obscure, our judgments so unconfirmed, and our love so feeble, that comparatively we live but little to the glory of our gracious Lord. All partialities from external relations or connexions, which tempt the minister to waver in his testimony, or the Christian in his obedience, are inconsistent with a proper regard to the Lord Jesus; and in this sense we should henceforth know no man after the flesh, whatever claim he may seem to have to our special regard. The justified believer is a new creature in a new world: his new relation to Christ, to the Church, and to heavenly things, together with his new obligations, interests, pursuits, principles and satisfactions, have superseded those that formerly prevailed: yea, "old things "have passed away, behold, all things are become new." Even the same actions that he formerly did are now performed from new motives and in a new manner; his attention to relative and social duties, and his diligence in worldly business, spring from new purposes, and receive a new direction. They, who know nothing of this new creation, are not in Christ, whatever they may think; and the more evidently it hath been experienced, the more clearly is a man's justification proved.

V. 18—21.

Every good gift comes from God, and to him the whole glory belongs: even they who are new creatures, yea, even apostles and martyrs, who are now perfect spirits before the throne, were once enemies to God by wicked works. The enmity to God began wholly on man's part; but the reconciliation was entirely devised, revealed and effected, by his offended Sovereign. In the person of Emmanuel, in his mediation and atonement, who "was "made sin for us, though he knew no sin, that we might "be made the righteousness of God in him," the foundation of this blessed reconciliation was laid; for "God "was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself."—When the kings of the earth appoint ambassadors, they generally depute them to those who are of their own rank in society; nor would they deign to send a solemn embassy to their own rebellious subjects, when vanquished, disarmed and condemned. But the King of kings and Lord of lords appoints ambassadors from himself to us, poor, apostate worms, and helpless, perishing sinners!—Earthly princes select persons of dignity and eminence to represent their persons, and act by their authority on these important occasions; but the Lord of glory deputes pardoned rebels and reconciled enemies to go to their former associates in rebellion, on this embassy of peace! The gracious proposals which they are instructed to make, and the encouraging terms which they are commanded to use, are equally expressive of condescension, compassion, and good-will to men; for the Lord himself, who might justly, and could easily, destroy them for ever, is pleased to "beseech them to be reconciled to him!" This language of our God and Saviour, by his ministers, to his proud enemies, must appear wonderful, beyond conception, to the holy inhabitants of heaven: yet the reception with which it often meets, and the contempt or disdain which it excites, must exceedingly increase their astonishment, and it will assuredly satisfy them concerning the propriety and equity of punishing the irreconcileable haters of God with everlasting destruction from his presence. The ambassadors for Christ, however, must adhere to their instructions, whatever reception they may meet with. They should magnify their office, and endeavour to represent their Lord, by exhibiting his character in their example, as well as declaring his whole counsel: they must conform to the laws and customs of his kingdom, and not to those of this evil world; neither fearing the contempt or rage of men, while "in Christ's stead they pray them to be re-"conciled to God," nor yet seeking to please men, or expecting any recompense, save from their gracious Lord. On the other hand, let all who hear the Gospel remember, that the faithful minister is the ambassador of Christ to them, sent to treat with them concerning reconciliation to God: and that his Lord will surely punish every insult and injury offered to him, as if done to himself in Person. The refusal of this proffered peace will leave men the enemies of God for ever: the removal of faithful ministers from such as have slighted their message is the recall of an ambassador of peace, and the fore-runner of a declaration of war. Let sinners then hear the voice of God, beseeching them to be reconciled to him: let the trembling penitent rejoice in the assurance that his application for "peace with God will not be rejected:" let professed Christians examine their interest in Christ, the great Reconciler, by inquiring whether they are become the friends of God, his cause, and his people: let ministers not only warn men by the terror of the Lord, but beseech them by his abundant mercies, to repent and turn unto him: and let believers consider, whether God can now withhold any good thing from them; or whether they can venture, lose, labour or suffer too much for him, who gave his beloved Son to be the sacrifice for their sins, that they might be "made the righteousness of God in him?"

NOTES.

CHAP. VI. V. 1, 2. The apostle and other faithful ministers, as fellow-labourers of God, and employed by him in reconciling the world unto himself, joined their earnest entreaties to the Corinthians also, as they had to others, that they would not "receive the grace of God "in vain." The word rendered grace signifies any special, undeserved favour; and when it is used for the regenerating and sanctifying work of the Holy Spirit, it implies that this is a special, undeserved favour. unspeakable love of God to sinners in the redemption by his Son, and in the appointment of "the ministry of reconciliation," and the mercy shown to those whom he thus "besought to be reconciled to him," would be altogether in vain, as to such of them as "neglected so great salvation," through unbelief and love of sin. The apostle feared that this had hitherto been the case of some professed Christians at Corinth: and doubtless many such would read or hear his epistle; whom therefore he most earnestly exhorted and entreated, not to render all the advantages set before them ineffectual to themselves, by persisting in unbelief; but that they would without delay, while the word of God was faithfully preached to them, embrace the proposals of mercy and grace set before them. For as JEHOVAH had assured the Messiah, according to the revelation made by the prophet, that he had "heard him in an "acceptable time, and succoured him in a day of salvation," (Notes, Is. xlix. 7, 8;) with a special reference to his intercession for the Gentiles, after his exaltation to his mediatorial throne; so the present season might be considered by the Corinthians, as "an accepted time and a day "of salvation" to all who sought an interest in the blessings of the Redeemer's kingdom. But if they refused the embassy of peace, they might expect to be speedily punished as the enemies of Christ. (Notes, &c. Prov. i. 20—33. Is. lv. 6, 7. Luke xiii. 25.)

V. 3—10. The apostle and his fellow-labourers, while they thus zealously fulfilled their embassy of peace; behaved with the utmost circumspection, that they might give no offence, or just cause of stumbling in any thing, lest their imprudence or misconduct should expose their ministry to censure or contempt, and thus render it ineffectual. They therefore studied, and were enabled, in all things to approve themselves such persons, as the ministers of a holy God, in so gracious and sacred a service, ought to be. This they did, "by much patience," resignation, constancy, and persevering assiduity, notwithstanding their multiplied and heavy afflictions. They were not discouraged, or induced to repine or despond, by urgent necessities and perplexing difficulties, even about obtaining a subsistence; or by repeated scourgings and imprisonments, from both Jewish and heathen magistrates; or by the tumultuous assaults of enraged mobs. But they patiently continued their labours, often spending the night as well as the day in unremitted toil, and adding religious fastings to those which absolute want imposed on them. To this patience they were encouraged by the pureness of their motives; and they approved themselves as the ministers of God, by the holiness, temperance, and purity of their whole conduct. They also showed themselves competent to impart all kind of divine knowledge and instruction to the world; they meekly endured all injuries and insults; not only without seeking revenge, but without remitting their endeavours of doing good to their enemies, and of showing kindness to all men. They abounded in the fruits of the Holy Spirit, and confirmed their doctrine by his miraculous gifts, and they exercised those gifts disinterestedly, and without ostentation, from unfeigned love to Christ and the souls of men. They were approved as the ministers of God, by "the word of truth," which they every where preached without any adulteration; and by that "power of God," which rendered it effectual to the conversion of sinners. They were also defended on every side by the compact armour of strict integrity, and an universal regard to the righteous commandments of God, from the purest evangelical principles. This fortified them against the assaults of carnal hope and fear, against the frowns and smiles of the world, and against every assault of the tempter. Thus they passed through honour and dishonour, without being elated by the distinction conferred on them, or depressed by the ignominy to which they were exposed. The calumnies raised concerning them, and the commendations which they received, were alike incapable of drawing them aside from their steady course. The world indeed treated them "as deceivers," who imposed their fictions on the credulous; yet they acted in all things as faithful men, and showed to mankind the true way of salvation. The noble and haughty of the world either knew them not, or despised them as obscure persons; but they were well known to multitudes as the instruments of good to their souls. They seemed continually exposed to death, or even enduring its stroke; yet they still lived by the marvellous power of God. They were chastened by him as in a state of tuition, and he used the malice of their enemies as the rod of his salutary discipline; but they were not killed by it. They had constant calls to be sorrowful, both on account of sins and sufferings, and were looked upon as unhappy men; yet divine consolations rendered them habitually cheerful, and joyful in the Lord. Though poor and needy in this world, they were employed by God in making many rich unto eternal life: and while they had no estates or property on earth, they possessed all things, by their relation to Christ and their interest in the promises; and the whole universe, if they had been the proprietors of it, could have afforded them nothing more, as conducive to their real good, than what they actually enjoyed or expected. Thus the whole of their temper and conduct, in the varied circumstances through which they passed, tended to show that their doctrine had a blessed effect upon their souls; and rendered them holy, beneficent, useful, and happy men. The animation, sublimity, and energy of expression, in this beautiful passage, have been generally and justly admired; and it shows how full the apostle's heart was of holy affections; and how open and communicative in speaking on these interesting topics. Making many, &c. 'We are 'continually enriching many with treasures, which they 'would not part with for all the revenues of kings and 'princes.' (Doddridge.)

V. 11—13. The apostle's consciousness of integrity and his fervent affection to the Corinthians, opened, as it were, his mouth, in this unreserved declaration of his sentiments and principles; so that he was not careful about the construction which some might put upon his words: for his heart was enlarged with an earnest desire of communicating good to them. If therefore they derived no further advantage from his ministry, it would be wholly owing to themselves. They were not straitened in him, whom Christ had made both able and willing to be useful to them; but they were straitened in their own bowels or hearts, through unkind suspicions, groundless prejudices, and disaffection. Now, the whole recompense that he desired for all his love to them, and his labours and sufferings for their good; (for he considered and spake to them as his beloved children,) was, that they would be enlarged after his example, and open their hearts in love, to receive the salutary counsels, cautions, and exhortations, which he gave them, in the character of a tender and prudent father.

V. 14—18. The apostle especially entreated his beloved children not to contract marriages, or form any intimate connexions, with their unbelieving neighbours, to which carnal motives might induce them. For this would resemble that unequal yoking of different animals, which the law of Moses forbade; (Note, Deut. xxii. 10;) and would tend to make them uneasy to each other. Thus, if believers connected themselves with unbelievers, their views, principles, pursuits, and satisfactions, must be discordant. The believer would be retarded and interrupted in his religious exercises, or his various duties in the family, in the Church, and to mankind; or drawn aside from them. And what cordial and comfortable intercourse could be maintained between the righteousness of the one, and the unrighteousness of the other party? What fellowship could there be, in the most important matters, between the children of the light and those of darkness? What agreement could be expected between the servant of Christ, and one in whom Belial, (or Satan,) who had cast off the yoke of obedience to God, abode and wrought? And what part or share could a believer take in the unhallowed pursuits and pleasures of an unbeliever, who despised the blessed Gospel of Christ? for righteousness and unrighteousness, light and darkness, Christ and Belial, might as easily associate in cordiality, as the believer and the infidel: all intercourse between them must be attended with restraint, disguise, or jarring sentiments. Such persons would live in different elements; they would draw different ways, and counteract each other's purposes; so that the unbeliever must be a cross, a snare, a clog, and a hinderance to the believer. In particular, what agreement could subsist between the temple of God and idols? Would Jehovah endure to have these hated rivals placed even in his own temple? Now Christians were the temple of God, his special residence, consecrated by the Holy Spirit. For thus he had promised of old to believing Israelites, and with a view to the days of Christ, that "he would dwell "in them," or "take up his in-dwelling in them," and "walk in them," as a man in his habitation, and so be their "God," &c. (Notes, &c. Lev. xxvi. 11, 12. Jer. xxxii. 37, 38.) Let them therefore value this special relation to God; and, as far as their relative and social duties would permit, let them separate from their heathen neighbours, and be careful to touch no unclean thing, or any thing that related to idolatry or iniquity. Eating things offered to idols, or with idolaters in their festivals, seems to be specially intended. (Is. lii. 11.) In this case they might be assured that the Lord would graciously accept of them, and receive them into his special favour; yea, that he would be in every respect a Father to them, and provide for, protect, comfort, enrich, and bless them, as his sons and daughters by regeneration and adoption. This, the Lord almighty, the omnipotent Ruler of the universe, had repeatedly intimated by the ancient prophets; and he now declared it more explicitly by his apostles, even in respect of the Gentiles. And what could they desire more to compensate for all losses, than this most intimate relation and union with the almighty God?

CHAP. VII.

The apostle exhorts the Corinthians to follow after holiness, encouraged by the preceding promises, 1; and to receive him, who had done nothing to forfeit their esteem, but had great love for them, and confidence in them, 2—4. He shows what comfort, under his troubles, Titus's good account of them had given him, 5—7; so that he did not repent of having grieved them by his former epistle, considering the happy effects of their godly sorrow, 8—11. He had written to approve his care of them as in the sight of God, 12; and he rejoices, especially, in the joy of Titus, and in his affection for them, as excited by their good conduct, which was answerable to the apostle's former boasting concerning them, 13—16.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10.

It is the peculiar honour of faithful ministers to concur most willingly in the great designs of the Lord, to labour in concert with him, and to join their sincere entreaties with his condescending invitations, in beseeching sinners not to receive the grace of God in vain. But the gracious declaration of the Gospel, and all the abundant provision which is made in Christ Jesus for the salvation of sinners, the labours of the most affectionate pastors, yea, the invitations of God himself by them, are often rendered ineffectual to those that hear them, through negligence, contempt, enmity, pride, and love of sin; save as they occasion their deeper condemnation. To prevent this fatal consequence as far as we are able, we should warn, expostulate, persuade, beseech, and exhort men, by every means that we can devise, to attend to this one thing needful. We should show them that "now is the accepted time, "and the day of salvation;" that the present day alone is theirs; the past is irrevocable; the future may find them in eternity: their reason may fail them; the Gospel may be withdrawn, or God may determine to leave them to final obduracy. Through the intercession of the divine Saviour, whom the Father hath "heard in the accepted time, and "succoured in the day of salvation," by carrying him through his sufferings, and exalting him to his heavenly glory, we now enjoy a day of grace: let then all be careful to avail themselves of it, whilst the Gospel is sounding in their ears, and perhaps the convincing Spirit is striving with their consciences. It is peculiarly incumbent on all who preach this great salvation, to give no offence in any thing, (except by their faithfulness,) that their ministry be not blamed; and in all things to approve themselves as the ministers of God to mankind, who are sent to show them the way of eternal life. Patience under afflictions; constancy in necessities and distresses; perseverance under persecutions; assiduity in labours, watchings and fastings; purity, knowledge, meekness, kindness, a spiritual mind, unfeigned love; sound doctrine, producing an evident change by the power of God in men's characters; disinterested, steady integrity, as an armour of righteousness on the right hand and on the left; are proper attestations of the ministers of God. Thus supported, they may pass "through "honour and dishonour;" they may go on unmoved, amidst "evil report and good report:" conscious of truth and sincerity, they may disregard the accusation of being deceivers; known and approved of God and his people, they may be reconciled to obscurity and contempt in the world; their dangers and deliverances, their chastenings and consolations, their outward sorrow and inward rejoicing, their poverty and usefulness in enriching many, their contentment with, yea, sometimes almost without food and raiment, and their interest in the unsearchable riches of Christ, may be contrasted with each other, and the whole of their conduct, circumstances, and labours, will concur to recommend their doctrine to mankind. But, alas, how few of those, who wear the garb or bear the office of ministers, answer this description! How many are the exact reverse of it! How often do even the preachers of truth give such offence by their evident, allowed, and habitual misconduct, that the ministry is blamed, and men are fatally prejudiced against the truth! And how common is it for us to be drawn into such improprieties of conduct, as prevent the usefulness of our most earnest exhortations! We should therefore continually beseech the Lord to erase every unfavourable impression, HAVING [a] therefore these promises, dearly beloved, [b] let us cleanse ourselves from all [c] filthiness of the flesh and spirit, [d] perfecting holiness [e] in the fear of God.

2 [f] Receive us: [g] we have wronged no man, we have corrupted no man, we have defrauded no man.

3 I speak not this [h] to condemn you: [i] for I have said before, that [k] ye are in our hearts [l] to die and live with you.

4 Great is [m] my boldness of speech toward you, [n] great is my glorying of you: [o] I am filled with comfort, I am exceeding joyful in all our tribulation.

which any past misconduct may have made on men's minds, and to prepare us for serving him more unexceptionably for the future, that we may give up every worldly interest and indulgence, and be willing to labour and suffer in the cause of Christ. We should seek to be made fruitful in good works, to be endued with pureness and knowledge, to be strengthened in the exercise of long-suffering and kindness, to be armed with the whole armour of God, to rejoice in the midst of tribulation, to be more desirous of making others rich than of avoiding poverty in our own circumstances, to leave our character and concerns in the Lord's hands, and to count ourselves to possess all things in his all-sufficient favour and precious promises.

V. 11—18.

Evident uprightness and enlarged love give us confidence in addressing even those, who have imbibed prejudices; our mouths will be opened in the cause of Christ, by the consciousness that we only seek the good of the people, and not our own emolument or reputation. We shall be more concerned, when they close their minds against our instructions, than when they refuse to communicate to our necessities; and the most desired recompense of our labour of love will be, their readiness to receive the truth from our lips. It will especially be near the heart of such pastors, to caution their beloved children in the Gospel not to be unequally yoked with unbelievers. The fatal effects of neglecting the scriptural precept in this matter are most evident. They whose cross it is to be thus connected, without their wilful fault, may expect peculiar consolations under it; but when believers will thrust themselves into these disadvantageous circumstances, contrary to the express warnings of God's word, they may expect to feel much additional distress. Indeed, all intimate connexions with unbelievers should be avoided. There can be no profitable communion between contrary characters; the attempt of making a coalition between Christ and Belial is unnatural and abominable; the kingdoms of righteousness and unrighteousness, of light and darkness, must wage perpetual war with each other; and we are most likely to do good to unbelievers, when we stand aloof from all other intercourse with them, besides that of duty and compassion. If Christians indeed, we are the temples of the living God; what have we then to do any more with idols? Let us value our relation to him, and not profane it; let us admire his condescending promises of dwelling and walking in us poor sinners, whom he hath reconciled to himself by Jesus Christ. Let us earnestly desire to have his temple made and kept pure, that we may have the comfort of his manifested presence. Let us beseech him to be our God and Portion, and to number us with his chosen people. Let us come out from among the workers of iniquity, and separate from all their vain and sinful pleasures and pursuits, and from all conformity to the corrupt customs and fashions of this evil world. Let us not touch any gain or indulgence that is spotted with sin. Let us remember that the world, though called Christian, still lieth in wickedness, and is full of unclean things which we must abhor. Let us assure ourselves that the Lord will receive all, who come in his appointed way, and at his call, and that he will be a Father unto them, and take them for his children; and if it be so envied a privilege to be the son or daughter of some earthly potentate, who can express the dignity and felicity of being the sons and daughters of the Lord almighty!

NOTES.

CHAP. VII. V. 1. This verse is evidently connected with the subject of the former chapter. The promises, which God has given in the Gospel, should excite those who hear them to aspire after holiness. All sin is filthiness in the judgment of God, because contrary to his holy nature and law. Sensual lusts may be called "filthiness of the flesh;" while pride, envy, revenge, avarice, and idolatry, may be intended by the "filthiness of the spirit;" or the former may signify the outward expression of sin by the body, in word or deed, the latter its inward workings in the imagination and affections. Aspiring after acceptance, adoption, and communion with God, and depending on his promises, Christians ought to cleanse themselves from all this filthiness; constantly watching against all evil thoughts, desires, words, and works, mortifying every corrupt propensity, renouncing every sinful interest or pleasure, seeking for an increase of all spiritual dispositions, and abounding in every good word and action. In this manner they ought to proceed in perfecting holiness, and in seeking entire conformity to the holy image and law of God, from reverence of his authority, fear of his displeasure, and an habitual sense of his holy heart-searching presence. Thus they should persevere in unremitted endeavours after perfect holiness, as long as they live, because their highest attainments leave them short of perfection. In this the apostle joined himself, thus intimating, that he too needed more perfect cleansing from the filthiness of sin, and that he called on others to do nothing, but the same which he himself was continually endeavouring to accomplish. Perfecting, &c. 'Still making progress in holiness.' (Whitby.)

V. 2—4. The apostle here returned to his more immediate purpose of re-establishing his authority among the Corinthians. (Note, vi. 11—13.) He called on them to receive him and his brethren as the ambassadors of Christ. There could be no reason for a contrary conduct, as they had injured no man in his person or connexions, corrupted no man's principles or morals, and defrauded no man in regard to his property, or in any respect coveted aught belonging to them. He did not speak thus, as disposed to condemn them of bringing such charges against him; for he had so favourable an opinion of them in general, that they were most dear to his heart, as he had before intimated, (iii. 2;) and, if other engagements would have permitted, he would willingly have spent and ended the remnant of his days among them. Indeed, he was so confident that they would submit to his apostolical authority, that he addressed them with great freedom and boldness, not fearing but they would take it in good part; and he even gloried among his friends concerning their conduct in the late transactions; yea, he was filled with such comfort on that account, as abundantly counterbalanced all his trials.

V. 5—7. After the apostle had passed from Troas into Macedonia, (ii. 13.) he was so harassed with persecution, that he had no rest in his flesh, or in respect of his outward circumstances; and he was troubled on every side, because the outward conflicts which he sustained with his enemies concurred with much inward anxiety about the Corinthians. But that God, whose peculiar character, prerogative, and delight it is to comfort such of his servants as are dejected and discouraged, and indeed all those who are humble and lowly in heart, was pleased to comfort him, by the arrival of Titus from Corinth. His safety and company were sources of satisfaction to him; but he was still more rejoiced at the comfort which Titus had received from the behaviour of the Corinthians, and while he described their earnest desire to remedy all abuses, their poignant sorrow for having dishonoured the Gospel, and their fervent affection towards the apostle, and longing desire of seeing him. So that his present joy was rendered the more abundant, even by means of the sorrow which had preceded it.

V. 8. The superintending inspiration of the Holy Spirit did not supersede the exercise of the understanding and faculties in the sacred writers; and the apostle's excess of concern, about the consequences of his former epistle, seems to have rendered his mind uneasy as to some expressions on it, lest they should counteract his design. If indeed he actually repented of having written so sharply, as well as had felt an after carefulness about it, it must not be ascribed to the things written, as if they had not been divinely inspired; but to infirmity, as not being fully sanctified, or freed from a propensity to excess of anxiety and solicitude. Some, however, render the passage, "Even if I had repented, I should not now repent."

V. 9—11. The apostle understood that his epistle had made the Corinthians sorry, as he expected it would, but it had been only for a short space; he therefore rejoiced, not in their sorrow, in which he shared, but in their repentance, which had been effected by it. For they had sorrowed "according to God," under the influence of his grace, with reference to his will and glory, and in dependence on his mercy; and this had been so ordered, that they might receive damage from the apostle in no respect, not even as the innocent occasion of it. For that sorrow, which was the effect of divine grace and the fear of God, tended directly to work repentance in the heart, and to render it humble, contrite, submissive, afraid of punishment, dependent on mercy, disposed to renounce and mortify every sin, and to walk in newness of life; and this repentance was "unto salvation;" as always connected with faith in Christ, and an interest in his atonement; so that no man would repent of thus sorrowing and repenting. Some are of opinion that the word, rendered

12 Wherefore, though I wrote unto you, [t] I did it not for his cause that hath done the wrong, nor for his cause that suffered wrong, but [u] that our care for you in the sight of God might appear unto you.

13 Therefore [x] we were comforted in your comfort: yea, and exceedingly the more joyed we for the joy of Titus, [y] because his spirit was refreshed by you all.

14 For [z] if I have boasted any thing to him of you, I am not ashamed; but as [a] we spake all things to you in truth, even so our boasting, which I made before Titus, is found a truth:

15 And his * inward affection is more abundant towards you, whilst he remembereth [b] the obedience of you all, how [c] with fear and trembling ye received him.

"not to be repented of," should be referred to "salvation," rather than to "repentance:" in the same sense as it is applied to "the gifts and calling of God," in the only place where the same word occurs in the New Testament, (Rom. xi. 29;) signifying its unchangeableness; or denoting a salvation which will infinitely more than compensate all that may be endured in attaining it: and perhaps the construction, in the original, favours this opinion. On the other hand, the sorrow of carnal men about worldly objects, being separated from the fear and love of God and faith in his mercy, often drank up their spirits, broke their proud rebellious hearts, drove them to suicide, or prompted them to the most desperate wickedness; and so worked death, temporal and eternal. (Marg. Ref.) "The sorrow of the world," is the certain way to desperation, unless 'God prevent it, as appears from the horrid examples of Cain, Saul, Ahithophel, and Judas: but the written tears of David give the clearest example of the other kind of sorrow.' (Beza.) It was evident that the sorrow of the Corinthians had been "after a godly sort," from their carefulness to rectify and amend what had been amiss, and their ready obedience in censuring the criminal; from their desire to show, that their connivance at the evils which had taken place was not the effect of corrupt principles, but of inattention, that by thus clearing themselves they might preserve the credit of the Gospel; from their indignation at themselves for having thus disgraced their profession; from their fear, lest any repetitions of such abuses should occur: from their most earnest desire of further degrees of purity; from their zeal for the glory of God; and from their desire, as it were, to revenge his cause on themselves, by submitting to any humiliations, or corrections, that were requisite for the honour of the Gospel. So that in every thing they were now freed from further imputation in this transaction. Numbers of them thus showed that they had not been directly guilty, though they had inadvertently connived at the offenders; and of this connivance they had repented, and sought forgiveness. Others, who had been more directly criminal, had likewise repented, and concurred in such measures, as implied a decided protest against the sins which had disgraced the cause of Christ, and those teachers who allowed of them: and thus the Church, as a society, was cleared from the guilt and infamy under which it lay; and the whole blame now rested with the individuals who still persisted in impenitence. As this verse relates to the conduct of a Christian society, in particular circumstances; and, probably, some of the clauses to one part, and some to another of this society; so these several particulars can only be applied by accommodation to the repentance of an individual.

V. 12. The apostle further assured them, that he had not written concerning the incestuous person, from a personal dislike to him, or merely on his account in any respect; nor from regard to his father, who had been so grossly wronged in this matter; but in order to show to them, as in the sight of God, his attention to their spiritual interests. The other offenders at Corinth, (1 Cor. vi. 1—11;) might also be alluded to; but it is evident, that the principal criminal was more directly intended.

V. 13—16. The apostle's endeavours had been made successful, and had eventually issued in the comfort of the Corinthians; and thus he shared their consolations, as he had before sympathized in their sorrows. It also increased his joy, to see how joyful their conduct had rendered the pious heart of his beloved Titus. If then he had before spoken so confidently of them, that it seemed to be boasting, he was not now ashamed of it; for as his doctrine and his professed affection for them had been true, so this his boasting of them to Titus had proved true also. And the love of Titus towards them was greatly increased, while he remembered the obedience which they all had shown to the authority of the apostle, signified by him; and how they received him even with a trembling fear, lest they should grieve him, or impress his mind unfavourably towards them. So that the apostle could now rejoice in the confidence which he had in them in all things. There was great address in this part of the epistle; and his kind acceptance of what had been done, and the confidence he expressed in the Church, were in general well suited to excite them to a more entire reformation, to break the party formed against him, to deliver them from the fascinations of the false teachers, and to re-establish his own authority.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

The promises of God should excite and direct us in following after holiness. His grace alone can efficaciously purify us: but it is our duty to use the means which he hath appointed; and, depending on that grace, to search out, and cleanse away, all "filthiness of the flesh and spirit," as abhorred by God and all his people. Perfect holiness should be the object of our unremitting prayers and endeavours: we should follow after it, as in the presence of God, and influenced by the fear of him, when no eye but his can possibly witness our conduct; and our lamented imperfections should excite us the more diligently to “go on unto perfection.” If the ambassadors of Christ would be received in that character, they must be careful “to wrong no man, to corrupt no man, to defraud no “man:” and they who reject those ministers, whose conduct and doctrine are thus uncorrupt, will greatly offend him that sent them. Yet we should avoid all rigorous censures, and show cordial love to the people, notwithstanding their faults; we should express as much confidence in them, and speak as favourably of them, as the case will admit: and when they show a readiness to amend what hath grieved us, we should deem it such a comfort, as may render us exceedingly joyful in all our tribulation. But we ought not to expect much rest to our flesh in this evil world: and if inward fears concur with outward opposition to distress us, we only taste of that cup, of which far better men have drunk more abundantly. We cannot sufficiently admire the compassion and condescension of our God, in revealing himself as the Comforter of those that are cast down. In all our dejections and perplexities, therefore, let us rely on him as our all-sufficient Helper. And, seeing the time of our extreme distress is commonly that of his interposition, we should endeavour to make it that of our most enlarged expectations. He works, however, by second causes and instruments: the converse of some pious friend, or a good account of those about whom we were anxious, or the affection of such as we feared were alienated, are often sources of relief and consolation, in which the kindness of the Lord should be acknowledged with much thankfulness.

CHAP. VIII.

The apostle sets before the Corinthians the liberality of the poor Christians in Macedonia, 1—5; and excites them to imitate this liberality toward the poor saints in Judea, that they might abound as much in this grace, as in other things; and show the sincerity of their love, as animated by the self-abasing and self-denying love of Christ, 6—9. They had before shown a readiness to this contribution, which would be graciously accepted by the Lord, 10—15. He commends to them Titus, and two other brethren whom he had engaged in this service, and who were, on many accounts, worthy of their particular regard, 16—24.

V. 8—16.

Through anxiety about the event of his labours, the faithful minister may be tempted to repent of his best intended and most scriptural endeavours to do good. He may fear that he spake too decidedly or sharply, and so gave needless offence, or excited undue sorrow, when he only performed the office of an affectionate reprover, under the influence of the Spirit of truth and love. Thus a man may be rendered uneasy for having done his duty, and afraid of doing it on another occasion. Indeed, we should be reluctant to cause sorrow; (even as the skilful, and tender surgeon is averse to give pain, though he finds it often necessary;) but we should rejoice in bringing men to that godly sorrow which worketh repentance, as their grief will be transient, and the benefit eternal. The loss of an earthly friend, the displeasure of a powerful superior, or other secular misfortunes, excite men's sorrow, and they think they have cause to mourn: how then should we be grieved for having offended our Creator, dishonoured his name, incurred his frown, and deserved eternal misery! The objects of worldly sorrow are trivial; its exercise is commonly unavailing; and it tends to death: we should therefore be careful not to indulge it. Unless sin be mourned over, as the cause of men's sufferings, and God be regarded as the righteous and merciful Author of them, their sorrow under afflictions and calamities leads to increasing enmity, to distraction, despair, and blasphemy. (Rev. xvi. 9—11.) We should therefore endeavour to turn all our mourning into a religious channel, that we may “sorrow after a godly sort.” But even sorrow about sin and our eternal concerns will be of no use to us, unless it worketh repentance; and even repentance itself may be counterfeited, and so not be “unto salvation.” Of all deceptions, this is most to be feared. A partial and superficial repentance; an unbelieving and hopeless repentance, like that of Judas; a pharisaical repentance, which is presented as an atonement for sin, and the rival of Christ's expiation; outward penances, mortifications, and observances, with an unhumbled and unrenewed heart; apparent contrition, without renouncing the favourite iniquity, or throwing back the wages of unrighteousness; these, and other kinds of repentance, are not unto salvation, but must be repented of, either in this world, or for ever in hell. But deep humiliation before God, hatred of all sin, attended by faith in the merits of Christ, a new heart and a new life, constitute “repentance unto salva-“tion never to be repented of.” May the Lord bestow it on every one of us! Sorrowing after this godly manner will work great carefulness and watchfulness in us, to amend our lives and subdue every iniquity: we shall thus be led to a serious endeavour to clear up the reality of our repentance to our own consciences, and to all men; we shall feel an indignation at ourselves for past transgressions; a fear of relapsing into sin; a vehement desire of forgiveness and sanctifying grace; a zeal for the honour of God; and a revenge, as it were, against those lusts which have excited us to offend him. When the faithful minister of Christ, (who hath warned the sinner of his guilt and danger, and reproved the inconsistent professor of the Gospel, that his care of them in the sight of God might be evidenced,) witnesses such “fruits meet for “repentance,” he will be comforted in helping their comfort; he will rejoice in the joy of other believers on their account; he will exult in realizing the favourable hopes which he had entertained; he will encourage the abundant affection of others towards them; he will commend their prompt and circumspect obedience, and rejoice to have confidence in them in all things.

NOTES.

CHAP. VIII. V. 1—5. The mention which the apostle had made, of his confidence in the Corinthians, gave him an occasion of introducing the subject of the collection which he was making for the Christians in Judea, which takes up this and the following chapter. With great delicacy and propriety he brought this forward by informing them, as an article of interesting intelligence, concerning the admirable conduct of the churches at Philippi, Thessalonica, and Berea in Macedonia. In extolling the generosity of the Christians in these cities, he gave the glory "to the grace of God bestowed upon "them;" the cause being thus manifested by the effect. Though they had been tried with great afflictions and persecutions, by which they had been greatly impoverished, yet the abundance of their joy in the Lord and his salvation had so enlarged their hearts to love of him, and his poor disciples whom they had not seen, that a large collection had been made among them, and their deep poverty had illustrated the riches of their liberality. So that the apostle testified in their behalf, that they were willing of themselves, not only do as much as was in their power, and even more than could have been expected from them, but that their inclinations were larger than their ability, and they would gladly have done more, had they been able; and instead of needing to be solicited, they had entreated him to accept of their subscriptions, and to take a part in the charge of conveying them to Jerusalem, and applying them to the intended purposes. In all this they had exceeded his most sanguine hopes concerning them; for they first devoted themselves to the Lord Jesus as his redeemed and "peculiar people, zealous of good works;" and then they gave themselves up to the apostle and his fellow-labourers, to be directed by them in doing the will of God according to his appointment, and in improving their talents to his glory. The word rendered grace, is, no doubt, sometimes translated gift; but to interpret "the "grace of God towards the churches," &c. to signify the large subscription for the poor Christians in Judea, as some learned men do, is wholly unprecedented; and the obvious meaning, viz. that their bounty to their poor brethren was the effect of the special grace of God conferred on them, agrees far better with the simple and reasonable language of Scripture on these subjects. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6—9. If the poor and persecuted Macedonians had exceeded all expectation in the riches of their liberality, the prosperous and affluent Corinthians would doubtless fully answer the apostle's hopes of them. When Titus had before been at Corinth, he had begun this good work among them; and Paul had therefore desired him to go again and complete it. By "this grace also" most expositors understand the benefaction itself, and indeed the word may signify the free gift of man, as well as that of God; yet it seems more consonant to the apostle's language, to explain it of the gracious influence of the Holy Spirit on their hearts, than of the gift itself, or their act of grace towards their brethren. As, however, the Corinthians abounded in all spiritual gifts, and in various Christian graces, they would doubtless "abound in this grace "also," and exceed other churches as much in the largeness of their contributions, as they did in affluence, or in faith, knowledge, utterance, and spiritual gifts. He did not speak this as a commandment how much they ought to give; but from the forwardness of their poorer brethren, he took occasion to make trial of their sincerity, in that love which they professed to Christ and his people, which would, he trusted, be satisfactorily demonstrated. For he was persuaded that they were spiritually and experimentally acquainted with the astonishing grace and love of Christ to sinners, "that though he was rich" in all the glory, authority, sufficiency, and felicity of the Godhead; yet "for their sakes," who were in themselves poor, guilty, polluted, and perishing sinners, "he had become poor," by assuming human nature, being born of a poor virgin, in a stable; living in poverty and affliction for many years on earth; and at length entirely impoverishing himself, as it were, to ransom their souls by his sacrifice on the cross. All this he submitted to most freely, in unspeakable compassion and condescension, that they by his poverty might be made rich with all the blessings of salvation; the mighty debt of sin having been thus discharged, and the forfeited inheritance of eternal life redeemed, with all things pertaining to their everlasting glory and felicity; and surely they could want no other argument to prevail with them to part largely and freely with their riches, for the relief and support of his poor brethren! In the judgment of the apostle, Jesus was rich before he was poor; and that it was voluntarily and graciously that he became poor for our sakes, &c.; but he was born in a stable, and educated in poverty; he was poor all his life, and had not where to lay his head, and only became rich after his death; and therefore if he was no more than a man, he certainly was poor before he was rich, not rich before he was poor.

V. 10—15. In respect of this service, to which the Corinthians would, as it must be supposed, feel themselves constrained by the love of Christ, the apostle only interposed with his advice; for it would be expedient for them, and consistent with their profession and character, to abound in this grace also, and evidently to copy that love by which they were saved; especially as they had begun a year before, not only to deposit money for this use, but to enter upon the service with a willing, earnest, and fervent mind. It behooved them therefore to make no hesitation about performing it, that their actions might coincide with the promptitude of their former determinations. In doing this, let every one of them proportion his contribution to his circumstances, for a small sum would be equally acceptable from a poorer person, as a larger from his more wealthy brother; and indeed, in every case, where a willing mind, to honour and obey Christ from humble love to him, was the principle of a man's actions, his services would meet with a gracious acceptance, nor would more be expected from him than he was enabled to do. To express and evidence this willing mind, the proportion, before recommended, would be necessary; yet it would not be proper to urge any man to exceed what he was thus disposed to give, lest, in vying with his brethren, he should intrench upon other duties. Nor did the apostle mean to relieve the poor Christians in Judea by burdening the Corinthians; or even to exact from them, and exempt other churches, so as to give rest to the one, and affliction to the other. He only desired that some measure of equality might be preserved among brethren in Christ: and that, in order to this, the Corinthians should on the present occasion communicate from their abundance, to relieve the necessities of their poor brethren in Judea: and then, if a reverse of condition should take place, through persecutions or other calamities, either to individuals or the collective body, the abundance of the Jewish converts, or of other churches, might be a fund for the supply of their necessities. Thus one might help another after an equal manner, according as it was written concerning the Israelites respecting the manna, which, though collected in different quantities, being thus properly dispensed, was all used, without the redundance being wasted, or any of the congregation left destitute of a sufficient supply. (Notes, Ex. xvi.) 'So far Christianity seems to require this equality, as that we should not 'suffer others to lack the necessaries of this present life, 'while we abound in them.' (Whitby.) proved diligent in many things, but now much more diligent, upon the great confidence which * I have in you.

V. 16—24. The cordiality and diligence of Titus, in his attention to the Corinthians, as well as his zeal for the good work in hand, were put into his heart by the Lord; and the apostle heartily thanked him for this interposition in his favour. For Titus not only complied with his exhortation to return to Corinth, from regard to his authority, but he was more prompt and willing for that service, than to need solicitation. The brother, that was sent with him, is generally supposed to have been Luke, whose praise was in all the churches, on account of the Gospel which he had written. This, however, is on many accounts uncertain: but this brother had been chosen by the churches of Macedonia to travel with the apostle, as their messenger to Jerusalem, with the contributions raised by them; which they were to dispose of, (as the deacons did the donations of their several churches,) to the glory of Christ, the one Lord both of the Jewish and Gentile converts; as the evidence of their ready mind to such good works; and to cultivate love with their Jewish brethren by reciprocal kindness. This the apostle had proposed and accomplished, that he might avoid all censure and suspicion of injustice or partiality, in the disposal of those large sums of money which had been raised: and that he might, by a prudent foresight, take care that his whole conduct should appear honourable, consistent, and unexceptionable in the sight of men; as well as that it should really be so in the sight of God. With Titus and the brother before mentioned, he had also sent another of his brethren, whom he had frequently found diligent in other services; but he expected extraordinary diligence from him on this occasion, as he was animated by the confidence in them which the apostle had expressed. Some think that Apollos is meant; but this is not probable, for he wanted no recommendations to the Corinthians: indeed curiosity, rather than edification, is concerned in determining such questions. If, however, any of them inquired who Titus was, that he should take the lead in this business; (as the apostle's adversaries would be likely to do;) let them be answered, that he was the partner of the apostle in the sacred ministry, who cordially united with him in all his designs, and who was particularly helpful to him in the affairs of Corinth. If the other brethren were inquired of, let it be said, that they were the chosen messengers of the Macedonian churches, whose characters, zeal, and conduct, in that important service, made them an honour to the Gospel, and greatly instrumental in manifesting the glory of Christ. It therefore was proper that the Corinthians should show, in their liberality on the present occasion, before these excellent persons, and the churches whom they represented, the proof of their love to Christ; and that they deserved those warm commendations which the apostle had bestowed on them. (Notes, Acts vi. 1—6.) It may here again be observed, that there is not the least reason to doubt, that the messengers, intrusted with the contributions of the Christians for their Jewish brethren, were chosen by the suffrage of the churches: how then is it that so little satisfactory Scriptural proof can be adduced, that the spiritual pastors were elected in the same manner? 'It would have been a most ready calumny against Paul, 'to have said that he greatly desired the care of these 'contributions, that he might sacrilegiously convert the 'consecrated money to his own use, had he not by every 'means guarded against it. But who, during these thousand years, and more, has followed this truly apostolical 'example?' (Beza.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

By ascribing all good works to the grace of God, we not only give the glory to him, whose due it is, but we also show men where their strength lies, and enable humble believers to read the Lord's special love to them, in the fruits of their love to him and to his people. Abundant spiritual joy not only supports the soul under great trials of affliction, but it enlarges the heart in the work and labour of love; so that the depth of poverty, in joyful Christians, only serves to render more admirable the riches of their liberality; for they will do more than could have been conceived in their power, and will manifest a still more enlarged good will. How different is this from the conduct of those, who will not concur in any expensive good work, except their reluctance is overcome by importunity, as uneasy to themselves, as to those who solicit them! The happy frame of mind before described must spring from an unreserved surrender of ourselves to the Lord, that we may henceforth live to his glory, as well as partake of his salvation; and then giving up ourselves to the counsels of his faithful ministers, as far as we are satisfied that they instruct us by the will of God. Remarkable examples of piety and charity should be brought forward, in order to excite others to a holy emulation, especially when their inferiority in outward things renders them less likely to be observed: and such instances will commonly be found very efficacious to this end, among those who are partakers of divine grace. They whom God hath employed to begin, will commonly best carry on and finish, his work of grace in his people. They who abound in faith, knowledge, utterance, fervent affections, and attachment to pious ministers, should be exhorted to abound proportionably in liberality to their poor brethren. And occasion should be taken from the forwardness of some, to excite others to show the sincerity of their love; for nothing can evince this, except the fruits of love, in good works to Christians for the Lord's sake. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ was not declared in kind words only; but, "though he was rich, yet for our

CHAP. IX.

The apostle assigns his reasons for sending the brethren before-hand, to make up the collections of the Corinthians, notwithstanding his confidence in them, 1—5. He encourages their cheerful liberality; under the figure of sowing seed, from which they might expect that God would give them an abundant increase, to enable them to sow still more abundantly to his glory, 6—11: for such services not only supply the wants of the saints, but excite them to abundant thanksgivings to God, and fervent love to their benefactors, and prayers for them, 11—14. He concludes the subject by thanking God for his unspeakable gift, 15.

"sakes he became poor; that we through his poverty "might be rich:" and they who truly know and experience the happy effects of his grace, will show their love to him and his people by good works, and not merely by a cheap profession. But, alas, we may easily estimate the degree in which most of us know the grace of Christ, by considering how small a proportion of our superfluities we retrench, and how little we deny ourselves, forego the prospect of wealth, endure inconveniences, and stoop to men of low estate, from love to his name! Doubtless this is the proper standard of our spiritual knowledge of Christ. In proportion to our views of his glory, we shall bear his image: and if this change were more fully effected, we should embrace poverty, endure hardship, and even lay down our lives, for the good of his people, when properly called to it: and at last we should deem all this as nothing, when compared with our obligations to his infinite love.

V. 10—15.

We may not enjoin the proportion, in which Christians should communicate to the relief of the necessitous; yet we may advise them concerning what is becoming, and consistent with their ability, profession, and hopeful beginnings, that their readiness to will may be manifested by the performance of it. But while the wealthy must be charged to be ready to communicate, the poorer should be encouraged to contribute their help also; yet without being urged to what may distress them: for if there be first a willing mind, it is accepted. This is indeed a universal rule: the sinner's willingness to repent, to believe in Christ, to love and obey him, and to do good to others for his sake, springs from divine grace: without this, all external services must be ostentatious and hypocritical; but where this is first produced, the defective attempts of the believer to glorify God will be accepted and graciously rewarded, though in strict justice they merit condemnation. We should be careful to act impartially in promoting works of charity: one should not be burdened to ease another, but equality and reciprocal help should be aimed at. Even among the poor people, in any parish or congregation, the most distressed may be relieved by such as are less straitened, with what they can at present spare; and when they in their turn come to be straitened, their brethren may concur to help them. Thus mutual love will be cemented, and prayers and thanksgivings for each other will be multiplied; and though none may have any thing superfluous, yet absolute want may commonly be excluded. But upon a larger scale, and where more wealthy persons are concerned, greater effects may be produced: and the most prosperous may be exhorted to liberality, from the consideration of the vicissitude in human affairs: nor can riches be secured so effectually for the benefit of the possessor, as by thus lending them to the Lord.

V. 16—24.

We should love those who have an earnest care for the welfare of the church, and we ought to be thankful to our benefactors: but the Lord, who put it into their hearts, should be first acknowledged and adored. It is becoming, to show a readiness for difficult and laborious services, and even to render exhortations superfluous by a willing mind: and it is proper to commend what is good in the most candid manner; for this is often the best method of exciting men to redoubled diligence. All our good works should be referred to the glory of the Lord, and be considered as the evidences of our ready mind to his service. Whatever disputes may have arisen about the appointment of rulers and officers in the church, it seems indisputable, that men should choose the persons, who are to manage their charitable contributions; though they may be counselled to select those whose praise is in all the churches. When ministers are in any way intrusted with large sums of money, they should be peculiarly careful to avoid all occasion of suspicion, or appearance of evil. It is indeed in the first place necessary to act uprightly in the sight of God, but things honest in the sight of men ought also to be circumspectly provided for. The world is full of selfishness, and enmity to true religion; and suspicions and slanders will be unavoidable, without great prudence, as well as exact conscientiousness: whereas a clear character, as well as a pure conscience, is requisite to usefulness. When approved, diligent, and faithful men are employed, in services evidently conducive to the benefit of mankind, and the glory of God, they are not only honoured by their brethren, but their character, conduct, and usefulness, is "the glory of Christ," and his Gospel is recommended by them. It therefore behooves Christians, among whom they labour, to respect them, and to show, before them and the churches of Christ, the proof of their love, and of the expectations which have been raised concerning them.

your mind, for which [e] I boast of you to them of Macedonia, [f] that Achaia was ready a year ago; and your zeal hath [g] provoked very many.

3 Yet [h] have I sent the brethren, lest our boasting of you should be in vain in this behalf; that, as I said, [i] ye may be ready:

4 Lest haply if [k] they of Macedonia come with me, and find you unprepared, we (that we say not ye) should [l] be ashamed in this same confident boasting.

5 Therefore I thought it necessary to exhort the brethren, that they would go before unto you, [m] and make up beforehand your * bounty, † whereof ye had notice before, that the same might be ready, as a matter of bounty, and not as of covetousness.

6 But [n] this I say, [o] he which soweth sparingly, shall reap also sparingly; and he which soweth bountifully, shall reap also bountifully.

NOTES.

CHAP. IX. V. 1—5. Beza explains the "ministering to the saints," not of the money contributed, but of the office and duty of those persons, who were chosen to take charge of it, and the care of the Corinthians in selecting them: but the context does not seem to favour this interpretation; at least as exclusive. The whole transaction, from the first thought and proposal of thus relieving the poor Christians in Judea, to the completion of the design, in the distribution of the money among them, by the apostles and elders at Jerusalem, may be included in this general term. (Marg. Ref. viii. 4.) The apostle, however, deemed it superfluous for him to write particularly on the duty and benefits of ministering to the necessities of the saints; as he took it for granted, that the Corinthians were well instructed in this respect, and even taught by God himself, thus to show love to their brethren. He also knew that they were forward to concur in the present good work; and accordingly he had spoken of them with confidence to the Macedonians, declaring that the Christians in Achaia, (of which Corinth was the capital city,) had been ready with their subscriptions a year before; and their zeal in so good a cause had quickened and excited many, who were before remiss. Yet he had sent Titus and the other brethren to complete the design, lest his boasting of their readiness should be in vain in that respect; for though he did not doubt but they would contribute, yet he feared lest they should not be ready when he came. And in that case the Macedonians, who accompanied him, would witness this circumstance; which would put him to shame for having boasted so confidently of them; and also tend to their disgrace, for having disappointed the expectations which had been formed respecting them. He had therefore judged it needful to desire the brethren to go before him to, make up their contributions, of which mention had been made before, both to them and the Macedonians; that it might evidently appear to be a bounty, or benefaction willingly bestowed, and not money extorted from them by importunity. 'The apostle calls that covetousness, which is 'done sordidly, and as extorted from a covetous person.' (Beza.) 'To give alms out of shame, or to satisfy the 'importunity of others, rather than out of love and good-'will, is a symptom of a covetous temper.' (Whitby.) The word, rendered bounty, signifies a blessing; which may either intimate that it should be given as an expression of gratitude to God, and as an act of praise and thanksgiving to him; or that it should spring from love, and a disposition to bless and do good to their brethren. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6, 7. The apostle would not prescribe the proportion, which every one ought to give; nor would he write as one that aimed to extort money from them; but this he said, that God would measure to them, according to the measure which they used towards their poor brethren. The seed-corn seems thrown away, yet this alone yields any increase: the prudent husbandman will not therefore sow sparingly, for he knows that in that case he must expect to reap sparingly; but, when the ground is well prepared, it may be expected, that if he sows liberally, he will receive a proportionable increase. Thus, money given in charity seems, to unbelief and selfishness, finally thrown away; but in fact, when given from proper principles, it is seed sown, and the only part of a man's substance, from which a valuable increase can be expected. God in his providence will often frown upon the undertakings of him who gives sparingly, and, by concurring causes, keep him poor; the evidence of his conversion must be proportionably dubious. If a real Christian, his consolations will be scanty, according to his penurious conduct towards his brethren; and his final recompense will be proportioned to the small measure of his present fruitfulness. But he who sows plentifully, from gratitude to God, and love to man, will in every sense reap a plentiful and bountiful increase. (Notes, Is. lviii. 7—12.) The word rendered bountifully, is, literally, with blessings. (Note, 1—5.) Let then every one determine for himself how much he would spare from other expenses, or deduct from his accumulated treasure, to sow in this fertile field, from which the word of God ensured so large an increase; and let no man do it grudgingly or of necessity, merely to keep up his character, or through the importunity of ministers; for God loved the willing cheerful giver, and no other; as this was the effect and evidence of his grace, and so well-pleasing to him through Jesus Christ. 'Two things are 'excluded by the apostle, namely, grief and necessity,' (Gr.) 'when, for instance, any person gives indeed, but 'with a grudging and illiberal mind, or even unwillingly, 'because he would not be evil spoken of among others; 'else he would not give at all.' (Beza.)

8 And [r] God is able to make [s] all grace abound toward you; that ye, [t] always having all sufficiency in all things, [u] may abound to every good work:

9 (As it is written, [x] he hath dispersed abroad; he hath given to the poor: [y] his righteousness remaineth for ever.

10 Now [z] he that ministereth seed to the sower, both minister bread for your food, and [a] multiply your seed sown, [b] and increase the fruits of your righteousness:)

11 Being [c] enriched in every thing to all * bountifulness, [d] which causeth through us thanksgiving to God.

12 For [e] the administration of this service, not [f] only supplieth the want of the saints, but is abundant also by many thanksgivings unto God;

13 Whiles by the experiment of this ministration, [g] they glorify God for your [h] professed subjection unto the gospel of Christ, [i] and for your liberal distribution unto them, and unto all men;

14 And [k] by their prayer for you, which [l] long after you for [m] the exceeding grace of God in you.

V. 8—11. The Lord would, without fail, in one way or other, make up to the givers what they expended in this good work; for he was able to make every gift of his free favour to abound to them; that so, having a sufficiency of all things desirable for themselves and families, and being enlarged in faith and love, they might have both a willing mind, and ability, for every good work. Thus the character and blessedness mentioned by the Psalmist would be verified in them, (Note, Ps. cxii. 9.) and their acts of kindness to the poor, from love to Christ, would be accepted works of righteousness, of which the benefit would remain with them for ever. The apostle therefore besought God, who, in his providence, both supplied the husbandman with seed, and mankind in general with food, from the increase of the field, that he would both provide for their wants in proportion to their seed sown in acts of charity; multiply to them the ability of sowing more in the same manner; accompany it with a larger blessing to others; cause them to abound more and more in the fruits of righteousness; and give them an increase of comfort in their own souls. That so, being enriched in every respect, they might be enabled to all bountifulness, which would occasion many to thank God on their behalf; and the apostle would then rejoice to be the instrument and means of such an honourable and beneficial work. The tenth verse may be thus literally translated: "May he, "who supplieth seed to the sower, and bread for food, "supply and multiply your seed, and increase the produc"tions of your righteousness." The sense is thus rendered more obvious, but it is not materially altered. The word rendered "seed sown," more properly signifies seed for sowing.

V. 12—15. The proper management of the service which was spoken of, by the liberal contribution of believers towards it, and the faithful and prudent application of the sums thus raised, would not only relieve the necessities of the poor saints in Judea, to whose comfort they ought gladly to communicate, but it would also produce abundance of thanksgivings to God, both for the seasonable supply given them, and for his grace bestowed on the Gentile converts. For thus experiencing their brotherly love, they would praise and glorify God for bringing them to act so consistently with their professed subjection to the Gospel of Christ; and for exciting them to so liberal a distribution to their brethren there and elsewhere. At the same time, they would glorify God by their fervent prayers in their behalf, as they would very much long to be acquainted with them, because of their love to them, and admiration of the exceeding grace of God, by which so happy a change had been effected in their character and conduct. This last consideration caused the apostle to break out in thanks to God for the unspeakable grace of the Gospel, and the gift of his Son to be the Saviour of sinners; by whom idolatrous Gentiles had been thus brought to glorify him; a foundation had been laid for the mutual love of Jews and Gentiles, as members of one Church, and children of one family; and the most effectual motives, encouragements, and example, had been afforded, to excite men to love and good works. 'The admirable 'charity, by which God is so much glorified, the Gospel 'receives such credit, others are so much benefited, and 'you will be so plentifully by God rewarded.' (Whitby.) 'If we understand it in this sense, it will be as remark'able a text as most in the Bible, to show that every good 'affection in the human heart is to be ascribed to a divine 'influence. But I am ready to think the apostle's mind, 'to which the idea of the invaluable gift of Christ was so 'familiar, rather, by a strong and natural transition, glan'ced on that.' (Doddridge.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

◆

The duty of ministering to the saints is so obvious, that it might be deemed superfluous to exhort Christians to it; yet they are so apt to forget their principles and obligations, and the remains of unbelief and carnal self-love are so powerful against the constraining love of Christ in their hearts, that it is in general necessary "to stir up "their minds by way of remembrance." This is often done most effectually, by expressing a favourable opinion of them, and high expectations from them; by commending the forwardness which they have shown on former

CHAP. X.

The apostle intreats the Corinthians not to leave him any cause, to exert that spiritual power, with which he was armed and which he was ready to use against those who despised his person and ministry, 1—6; assuring them, that when he came, he would be found as mighty in deeds, as he was in writing when absent, 7—11: and contrasting his own conduct, with the ostentatious boastings and ambitious intrusions, of the false teachers, 12—18.

occasions, and the happy effects of their zeal on the conduct of others; and when we have a good hope that the persons addressed are real believers, this will consist with godly sincerity, and may be considered as true wisdom.—It is very painful for ministers to be compelled to retract or excuse the commendations which their fervent love had bestowed on their people, and when other Christians witness in them a conduct inconsistent with such confident boastings. Men should be very careful not to shame or grieve in this manner their faithful pastors, as that will eventually tend to their own deeper disgrace. Many an intended good work has been neglected or rendered useless by delay: it is therefore proper to exhort men to be prompt in doing what they have shown a willingness to engage in. Works of piety and charity should flow spontaneously from the gratitude and benevolence of a believing heart; and not require extorting by importunity. This savours of covetousness, and it even puts those, who forward useful designs, to the painful necessity of labouring to draw money from those who ought to give, but are reluctant to part with it. Yet the main benefit of every act of charity for the Lord's sake will redound to the giver. He sows this good seed in a fruitful soil, and his bountifulness to man will assure him of the Lord's bountifulness to him. Whatever expenses therefore are retrenched, or from whatever fund it is deducted, we should not grudge or be sparing in this seed. It is spiritual policy for us to spend less on every kind of indulgence, and to lay by less for our families, that we may give more to the needy for Christ's sake; for this will be best secured and most productive. Even persons in moderate circumstances may sow much of this seed, if, by various little savings and self-denials, they will but study to spare something to relieve their distressed brethren; and this they will do, if their faith and love abound. With these truths before their eyes, men must be left to do, as they have purposed in their hearts; for they who give in a grudging manner, and of necessity, have little reason to expect the acceptance of God, who loveth a cheerful giver.

V. 8—15.

There are a few "who scatter, and yet increase;" but there are far more, even among those who are zealous for evangelical doctrines, "who withhold more than is meet, "and it tendeth to poverty;" for God is able to make all grace to abound to those whose hearts are enlarged with kindness to their brethren; and it should be remembered, that he gives us every thing far more freely than we can give alms to a poor beggar. If he sees it good for us, he can so prosper us, that, "having all sufficiency in all "things, we may abound unto every good work;" and they who, from love to him, "scatter abroad and give to "the poor," have "a righteousness that shall endure for "ever." He can easily give us enough to use, and enough to disperse, that we may have more, sow more, and reap more, and so "increase the fruits of our righteousness:" that, being enriched in every thing unto all bountifulness, we may be happy in ourselves, blessings to others, and instruments of promoting his glory. But, alas! the faithfulness of our God in this respect is little known among professed Christians, because so few fairly make the experiment. The Lord is pleased to try and purify many of his saints by poverty, and he proves others by employing them as his almoners. Their faithfulness and liberality in this service not only supply the wants of his saints, but abound in a large revenue of praise and thanksgiving to God: it evinces the sincerity of their own professed subjection to the Gospel; it stirs up many to pray for them and long after them, and to admire and glorify God for his exceeding grace in them. Thus they adorn the Gospel, animate the worship of believers, cement mutual love, and derive abundant blessings unto their own souls. While therefore we thank the Lord for the unspeakable gift of his Son to be our gracious Redeemer, through whom we poor sinners may perform such honourable and useful services, with assurance of acceptance and abundant recompense, let us endeavour to copy the example of Christ, by being unwearied in doing good, and deeming it "more blessed to give than to receive."

NOTES.

CHAP. X. V. 1—6. Having concluded other subjects, the apostle here begins to speak more directly against the false teacher or teachers who opposed him at Corinth. Even he, Paul, whom they reviled and despised, as not daring to assert his authority among them, besought them, by the meekness and gentleness which Christ, though possessed of all power in heaven and earth, had exercised towards his enemies, and which he required of his people, not to compel him to adopt measures apparently of a contrary nature. Some indeed represented him as mean-spirited and abject, when present among them; for they disdained his lowly appearance, and humble, unassuming deportment: yet, being absent, he was bold towards them, and wrote as one who had resolved to vindicate and exert his apostolical authority. But before matters came to this extremity, he besought them, with all meekness and gentleness, not to constrain him to it, that he might not be bold among them, with that kind of confidence with which he was determined to proceed against certain persons, who suspected and accused him of conducting himself with carnal policy, and aiming at secular advantages in the execution of his sacred ministry. In this charge they included his fellow-labourers also, and by such misrepresentations they seduced the Corinthians from their attachment to him and them. But though he and his coadjutors were liable to the manifold infirmities incident to the present mortal life, and were not exempt from imperfections, as "walking in the flesh," living in the body, and not being yet perfected in holiness; yet they did not war against sin and Satan, or conflict with their numerous opposers, according to the maxims of carnal policy, with craft and dissimulation, in dependence on their own wisdom and strength, or with an aim at their own interest or honour. For the weapons, which they employed in this spiritual warfare, were not carnal, nor did they produce their effect by their own natural energy; but they were mighty through God, whose power wrought by them to demolish the strong-holds of Satan by which he had maintained his empire of darkness, idolatry, and wickedness, in the world. For the preaching of the Gospel, confirmed by miracles and accompanied by the power of the Holy Spirit, pulled down these strong-holds, dispersed Satan's garrisons, delivered his captives and subverted his authority, by diffusing the knowledge of God, of his commandments, and of his salvation, among men. Thus the ministers of Christ went on, casting down men's vain imaginations, presumptuous speculations, and carnal reasonings; exposing the falsehood and folly of that proud philosophy which led to skepticism and atheism, as well as of those fables which supported the stupid idolatry of the populace, and showing also the worthlessness of pharisaical forms and duties, and of every scheme of religion which flattered men into a good opinion of themselves. So that their doctrine was rendered effectual to "cast down every high thing," every self confident notion, every proud objection or ambitious purpose, and all that self-sufficiency, impenitence, obstinacy in rebellion, unbelief, and independence of spirit, which exalted themselves in men's hearts against the humbling, holy knowledge, worship, and service of God, and enslaved men to idolatry, impiety, infidelity, and vice. When these were cast down, and a man was brought to "the light of the knowledge of the glory of "God, in the face of Jesus Christ," (Notes, &c. iv. 1—6.) and to the exercise of repentance and faith, he found every imagination, reasoning affection, and purpose of his heart, captivated by love to his divine Saviour; and being thus conquered by grace, and held captive by love, he became, by a sweet constraint, obedient to his teaching and command, and from his inmost soul he was thenceforth the willing subject of Christ, in all his ordinances and commandments. As no outward miracle could effect this change without new-creating grace, so we may be sure that the power of God in the latter was principally intended by the apostle, though many expositors almost wholly confine it to the former. Thus he and his fellow-soldiers waged war against their opposers. By faithful preaching, disinterested labours, patient sufferings, holy lives, and fervent prayers, they sought to change their enemies into friends to them and their divine Master; and thus they prevailed against Satan, to the subversion of his strong-holds and the revolt of his subjects. Yet the apostle had another weapon to use on some occasions, and this also was "mighty, through God," to avenge his despised authority on obstinate opposers. He meant, and was in readiness, by miraculous judgments, to avenge the cause of Christ on those disguised enemies, who persisted in their disobedience, as he had on Elymas and others: but he waited to bring back such as had been deluded by them to their former obedience, and to complete that work of love, before he proceeded to use severer methods. Many expositors seem to confine the interpretation of these verses almost entirely to the divine power, by which the apostles were enabled to confound all open opposers, as well as to inflict judgments on those professed Christians, who by their persevering misconduct exposed themselves to the censures of the Church. But it appears evident that "the "Gospel, as the power of God unto salvation," is primarily intended; and that the conversion of opponents, and the restoring of lapsed Christians to obedience, were the first objects aimed at; but when all proper means had failed in respect of the latter, then not so much the censures of the Church, as miraculous punishments denounced by apostolical authority, and made effectual by the power of God, were the weapons which must be had recourse to.

V. 7—11. Some of the Corinthians had been seduced into an ill opinion of Paul, on account of his mean figure, indigent circumstances, and exterior disadvantages; but would they continue to regard such outward appearances, which had no connexion with real excellency? Or would they value men on account of external accomplishments, plausibility, and self-confidence? If any man, who opposed him, were ever so confident that he was a disciple and minister of Christ, yet let him reflect on the evidence which there was, that Paul and his brethren were so too; and then he would perceive, that he had no ground of self-preference, or encouragement to oppose them. St. Paul might indeed have boasted something further of his apostolical authority, which the Lord in his special favour had given him, for the edification of the Church and the salvation of souls, and not for their destruction; no doubt, this might be occasioned by it in some instances, though contrary to its genuine tendency and the use which he had made of it. Nor could this claim of pre-eminence have made him ashamed, as it was sufficiently authenticated by his miracles, conduct, and success in his ministry; and the effects of it might soon be felt by the refractory party at Corinth. Yet he did not choose this topic, or enlarge about his power to punish opposers, that he might not appear disposed to terrify them by his epistles. For some of them ventured to say, that his epistles were written with much apparent weight of argument and power of conviction, and contained the language of authority and firmness; but that his bodily presence was weak and feeble, and his elocution contemptible. It is recorded that the apostle was of low stature, crooked, and bald; some add, that he had an impediment in his speech, that his voice was shrill and unpleasant, and his delivery ungraceful. However this might be, his scrupulous rejection of the studied ornaments of the Grecian eloquence, and his plain, modest, and unaffected address, would render his speech contemptible with many persons, though his subject were ever so judiciously discussed, and his delivery every way suitable to the occasion; and the very meanness of his apparel would render his appearance despised by numbers. But he warned such as ventured to speak thus of him, to expect that he would act as decidedly when he arrived at Corinth as he now wrote, and that he would show them that he was able to assume a firmer tone, and act with more authority and sharpness, when he saw occasion.

V. 12—16. The favourers of the false teachers at Corinth might deem it presumption in Paul to rank himself with such wise, eminent, and eloquent men as they were; and he seems, in an ironical manner, to refer to this opinion. But he assured them, that he could not conscientiously copy their example of ostentatious boastings and self-commendations; for they, by measuring themselves, and their endowments and performances, with their own erroneous judgment of excellency, and with those of each other, and thus comparing themselves with such men as they were, without bringing their characters, gifts, and ministry, to the proper standard, plainly proved that they were defective in wisdom and self-knowledge, and far from the way of attaining them. But the apostle and his friends would not boast of their qualifications or services, in this vague and unmeasurable manner, but would speak of them, with reference to the true standard, even that rule or line, which marked out the services, to which the providence and commandment of the Lord had called them. This measure, as it respected Paul, the apostle of the Gentiles, had reached even as far as Corinth. For he had not stretched himself beyond his commission, or left his work in other places, from haste to come to them, though not within the line of his duty, as the false teachers had done; but, proceeding regularly in his work of preaching the Gospel to the Gentiles, he had at length come to them, and had been the first that taught them the way of salvation. To this time, it appears, from the history, that Achaia was the boundary of the apostle's labours in Europe. He did not therefore boast of interfering with services which lay beyond the line of his present duty, or seek the credit of other men's labours, as their false teachers had done, by intruding among them and perverting them. On the other hand he hoped, when their faith was increased even by means of these events, so that he could safely leave them to their ordinary teachers, that he should be so magnified and helped forward by them, as to proceed, with abundant success, to preach the Gospel in other parts of the Peloponnesus, or even in the more remote regions of Italy and Spain; according to his rule of labouring for the conversion of the Gentiles, without interfering with the duty marked out to other men, or boasting of things made ready to his hand, as if he had actually performed them. 'To the apostles God allotted the charge of converting the world, and endued them with gifts suited to the greatness of their work. To them therefore it belonged to form their converts into churches, and to appoint rules for their government. The province assigned to the evangelists, and other inferior ministers, was, to assist the apostles, to build upon the foundation laid by them, to labour in the Gospel under their direction, and in all things to consider themselves as subordinate to the apostles. According to this wiew of the matter, the false teacher at Corinth, who was but at best an inferior minister of the Gospel, had in many things acted out of the bounds in which he ought to have laboured.' (Macknight.)

V. 17, 18. 'If any teacher boast, let him boast of having performed his duty in the manner the Lord hath appointed.' (Macknight.) Surely, this is widely different from glorying in the Lord! (Marg. Ref. Notes, Jer. ix. 23, 24. 1 Cor. i. 26—31.) The apostle was constrained to speak of his own labours and success; but he must remind the Corinthians, that every man who gloried ought to glory in God as his Portion and in the Lord Jesus as his whole Salvation, and the Giver of all his hopes, grace, endowments, and usefulness, to whom all the honour of them was due. If a man could not thus glory in the Lord, all other glorying must be vain-glory, and end in shame and misery; for that man was not to be considered as approved, in respect of his profession or ministry, who could speak eloquently and plausibly in his own commendation; but he, to whose faithfulness the Lord himself bore testimony, and whose services he commended, by employing him as his instrument for good to many souls, and by giving him the gracious earnests of final acceptance and commendation. Most expositors suppose, that the commendation, here mentioned, was given when God enabled a man to work miracles, or exercise spiritual gifts; but many wrought miracles and prophesied, who were workers of iniquity, (Notes, Matt. vii. 21—23. 1 Cor. xiii. 1—3;) and it could not be properly said, that the Lord commended them. The evident usefulness of a minister's labours is a less equivocal testimony; yet the final account the "Well done, good and faithful servant," and the rejoicing in the testimony of conscience, in the mean while, seem especially intended. (Note, 1 Cor. iv. 5.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

They who meet with unjust and ungrateful usage from those to whom they are labouring to do good, should frequently meditate on the meekness and gentleness of Christ. As he was reviled and despised by those whom he came to save, none need wonder or be discouraged at meeting with a similar contradiction of sinners, in the same labour of love. They should endeavour to go on patiently and quietly, after his example, and to "overcome evil with good;" and even when constrained by duty to reprove and correct, or to exercise authority with firmness and sharpness, they should do it with reluctancy, show a desire to avoid the painful necessity, and manifest a loving and forgiving spirit, that all may see how dear the meekness and gentleness of Christ are to them. Ministers should be careful to avoid all appearance, and to obviate all suspicion, of walking according to the flesh; and they who falsely accuse them of so doing will expose themselves to the displeasure of God. Though encompassed with infirmities and temptations, and subject to manifold imperfections, the servants of Christ are engaged in a warfare which cannot be waged "after the flesh." Human wisdom, affected eloquence, dissimulation, compulsion, angry disputations, slanders, revilings, and ridicule, are carnal weapons; and however powerful they may seem, they will be found useless in this war, and tend rather to fortify and garrison Satan's strong-holds, than to pull them down. For success against the kingdom of darkness must be expected, "not from might, nor power, but from the Spirit of God." The appointed means, however feeble they appear to unbelief, will be "mighty through God:" by his command, the walls of Jericho fell down at the blast of the trumpets, far more speedily and entirely than any engines of war could have demolished them. (Notes, Josh. vi.) And the preaching of the cross, by men of faith and prayer, has always been most fatal to the strong-holds of idolatry, infidelity, impiety, and wickedness. Men may, if they can, give energy to means of their own inventing; but Satan derides their puny efforts, and takes them captive at his will. But God works by his own appointments; by his power the enemy is driven from his fortifications; men's imaginations are cast down, their reasonings and objections silenced, their pride abased, their illusions dissipated; the knowledge of God finds admission into the heart; reverential fear, repentance, humility, faith, love, and gratitude follow; and the whole soul, with all its faculties and operations, is at length captivated to the obedience of Christ. But while he thus makes "his people willing in the day of his power," and gradually perfects them in obedience and the beauties of holiness, he is in readiness to avenge the disobedience of the impenitent and unbelieving, especially that of hypocrites and false teachers, who corrupt the Church and dishonour his name.

It is peculiarly unsuitable to the character of Christians, though lamentably common, to judge of men, or look

CHAP. XI.

The apostle excuses himself as to his apparent self-commendation; because he did it out of godly jealousy over the Corinthians, whom he had espoused unto Christ; lest false teachers should pervert them, as Satan did Eve, 1—3. None of their new teachers preached another Saviour, or another Spirit, or another gospel, than he had done, 4. He was not at all inferior to the greatest apostles; for though rude in speech, he was not so in knowledge, 5, 6. He declined being chargeable to the Corinthians, and still would do so, not from want of love, but to counteract his opposers, 7—12; who were false apostles, ministers of Satan, though apparently ministers of righteousness; even as Satan transformed himself into an angel of light, 13—15. As many gloried, and were borne with, even while over-bearing, insolent, and rapacious; he would, though reluctantly, glory also, 16—20. Accordingly, he gives a most astonishing account of his labours, dangers, sufferings, and deliverances, 21—33.

upon things after the outward appearance; as if learning, eloquence, affluence, a graceful person and address, or elegant attire, were evidences of a man's holiness and heavenly wisdom, or the seal of Christ to his ministerial character! Or as if the want of such embellishments proved a man not to be an eminent Christian, or an able, faithful minister of the lowly Saviour! Even Paul was base in the judgment of some self-sufficient and accomplished Corinthians; and though "his letters were weighty "and powerful, yet his bodily presence was weak, and "his speech contemptible;" so that Satan's emissaries far excelled him in these exterior recommendations. This should teach us not to judge of gold merely by its glitter, in which tinsel often exceeds it; but to bring it to the balance, and weigh it. When professors or preachers of the Gospel, are so confident that they belong to Christ, that they can hardly allow those who cannot coincide in their views, or approve their conduct, to be Christians, and when they treat the most approved characters with supercilious contempt and revilings, their very confidence should excite our suspicions, as it far more accords to that of "the deceitful workers" at Corinth, than to that of St. Paul and his fellow-labourers, which was modest, humble, and candid. The great apostle of the Gentiles, when constrained to mention the authority which the Lord had given him for edification, and not for destruction, and which he used in the most excellent manner, and with the most blessed success, spake of it with reserve, lest he should seem to boast or to threaten. Whereas some men seem out of their element, when they are not boasting of themselves, and menacing divine judgments on all who oppose them, as if they would terrify every one into silence and submission! Let us not dare to make ourselves of that number, or to compare ourselves with those who thus commend themselves: let us leave them to expose their own want of wisdom, humility, and charity, by measuring themselves by themselves, and all other men by their own standard; by boasting of themselves without measure or decency; by intruding into other men's labours, glorying in things made ready to their hands, and neglecting their own work, that they may spoil that of other men. But let us humbly compare ourselves with the word of God, and the example of prophets and apostles; let us measure ourselves by the rule of our duty, the obligations conferred upon us, and the work assigned us; let us be diligent, and "study to be quiet and mind our own busi"ness," though in an obscure situation; let us be thankful for success, according to the measure and rule which God hath distributed to us, whether called to preach the Gospel, or to serve Christ in any other way, without meddling in other men's labours, or boasting in services performed by them. Let us hope for the increase of the faith and grace even of those who have most failed in their duty to us; let us be zealous and bold, in a humble, patient, prudent, loving, and self-denying manner; let us rather be desirous of doing abundant good, than of acquiring great reputation; let us remember to glory in the Lord our Salvation, and in all other things, only as evidences of his love, or as means of promoting his glory; and, instead of commending ourselves, or seeking the praise of men, let us desire and aspire after "that honour, "which cometh from God only."

NOTES.

CHAP. XI. V. 1—6. The apostle allowed, that, in general, self-commendation implied folly; yet the case required it of him at that time, and his zeal for the honour of Christ, as well as his love to their souls, rendered him an exception to ordinary rules. He therefore wished and prayed, that they would show a disposition to bear with him a little in what they deemed his folly; he must, however, venture all consequences, and they must bear with him, whether they approved or disapproved of it. For he was jealous over them, with that fervent love and anxious solicitude for their welfare, which sprang from zeal for the glory of God, and regard to his authority. He had solicited and obtained their consent to that sacred and blessed union with Christ, which might be called their espousals to the One Bridegroom and Husband of the Church; to whom alone their devoted, faithful, and obedient affection belonged, and from whom all their felicity was to be expected. He therefore feared every thing, which tended to alienate, weaken, and divide their attachment to him; or pollute them either in body or mind: for his ambition was to present them to Christ, at last, "holy, unblamable, and unreprovable in his sight;" as a chaste virgin is presented to her intended husband, when the marriage is completed. But he feared, lest, by any means, the false teachers should draw them aside from their simple dependence on Christ, and love and obedience to him, into a false confidence, carnal affections, or disobedience: lest they should be deluded from that purity of doctrine, that spiritual frame of mind, and that honourable conduct, which became this high relation; even as Eve in Eden was beguiled by Satan, in the form of a serpent, to seek happiness in departing from God, and disobedience to him, being deceived by specious and subtle pretences and insinuations. The Corinthians were peculiarly exposed to this danger from those who puffed them up with an idea of their extraordinary knowledge; and seduced them, by artful reasonings, to seek liberty and pleasure in other things, besides obeying, and walking with, God. Indeed, if any man could possibly have preached another Jesus, a more gracious and precious Saviour, than Paul had declared to them; or could have conferred on them another Spirit, whose gifts and influences were more excellent than those which the Holy Spirit, through Paul's ministry, had bestowed on them; or, in short, if another and more suitable Gospel had been preached, than that which they had embraced; there might have been some reason for their bearing with the new teachers, or even preferring them. Or, in that case, it would have become them to have borne with the infirmities of their first instructor in Christianity. But the contrary was manifest; for, whatever they might think, he was conscious that he was in no respect inferior to any of the apostles, without excepting Peter, James, or John, who seemed to be the chief of them all; he might, therefore, well be confident that their new teachers could add nothing valuable to the instructions which he had given. He had indeed appeared among them to be "rude in speech," as a person of ordinary education, ignorant of the rules of eloquence, and careless respecting them; (and this might be the case, though his discourses were replete with natural pathos, and sound argument;) yet he had shown himself competent in knowledge to instruct his hearers in every part of Christianity. St. Paul's declaration, that he "was not a whit behind "the very chiefest apostles," when carried to its consequences, is totally subversive of the enormous baseless fabric of Popery, which rests entirely, (as distinguished from the rest of the professed Christian Church,) on the vain imagination, that Peter was supreme over all the apostles, and that the Pope, or the Roman Church, or both, inherit, by some unknown title, that supremacy. Many expositors suppose, that the expressions used by the apostle, in respect of his espousing the believers at Corinth to Christ, are taken from Grecian customs; and others conclude, that one false teacher, and he a Jew, and disposed to corrupt Christianity with Judaism, was the author of the disturbances at Corinth. But neither of these opinions seems clearly deducible from the epistle itself.

V. 7—12. The chief distinction, between the new teachers at Corinth and Paul, seems to have been in what they had received, and not what they had imparted. And would the Church then be offended with him, because he had abased himself, in working at a trade for his maintenance, and submitting to many self-denials, that they might be exalted to the privileges of God's people, by preaching the Gospel to them without putting them to any expense? Indeed, he had done this, lest he should prejudice their minds; and he might in some sense be said even to have robbed other churches, by receiving money of them for his subsistence, whilst he was labouring for the benefit of the Corinthians. And when he had really been in want among them, he neither ceased from his ministry through discouragement, as an indolent person, nor yet put them to any charge: but the Christians from Macedonia, especially from Philippi, supplied him with what was absolutely necessary. (Note, Phil. iv. 10—19.) Thus in all things he had kept himself from being burdensome to them; and he had seen cause to determine that he would continue to do so: and, as surely as he faithfully preached the truth of Christ, he was resolved, that no man, by entreaties, arguments, or reproaches, should ever take from him this ground of glorying; and that he would receive nothing towards his maintenance from any one, through all the regions of Achaia. If the reason of this purpose were demanded, or if any should impute it to his want of love, he would appeal to God, who well knew his tender affection for them. But indeed he was resolved to proceed in his present conduct, that he might deprive those of the occasion of slandering him, who were ready to seize on every handle against him; and to set them a good example, that, in respect of zeal for the honour of Christ and love of the Church, in which they gloried, they might be shown in what manner to make good their pretensions; and learn, that the self-denial and disinterestedness of the apostle was a far more unequivocal evidence of zeal and affection, than their plausible harangues, joined with a selfish and domineering conduct. It is generally supposed, that the false teachers affected the praise of preaching the Gospel freely: but the language, which the apostle afterwards uses, clearly proves that this was not the case. (20.) They seem rather to have despised Paul, as degrading himself, and as acting inconsistently with the dignity of an apostle, in thus labouring, and enduring poverty, instead of demanding a maintenance. As Corinth was a rich city, his long continuance there might have been ascribed to mercenary motives, had he not adopted this plan: and as the Macedonians, though far poorer than the Corinthians, yet maintained, in part, the apostle, when labouring at Corinth; it might in some sense be said, that they were robbed, to exalt their more prosperous brethren.

V. 13—15. It was not to be expected that the persons, to whom St. Paul referred, would in this respect be found like him, as they were indeed spurious apostles, who falsely pretended to be sent by Christ; in this and other things working deceitfully, acting with duplicity, and varnishing over their hypocrisy and selfish intentions by specious professions; (iv. 2;) so that their style, manner, and conduct, were an affected imitation of those of the apostles; but their ministry tended to dishonour God, and to deceive souls. Nor need it excite any wonder, that such wicked men should be so specious in their appearance and pretensions: for even Satan, their master, could disguise himself, and tempt men in the form of a holy angel, a messenger from the world of light, instead of appearing as the prince of darkness. He could delude men with professions of extraordinary illumination, high affections, evangelical truth, revelations, singular sanctity, deadness to the world, austerity, or sublimity of devotion, and in various other ways; that so he might undermine or disgrace the holy religion of Christ, hurry them into absurdities and extravagancies, lead them to neglect the plain rule of the written word, and change them into enthusiasts, antinomians, or superstitious formalists. It was not therefore any thing great, or difficult, or marvellous, that his ministers should be transformed, and assume the appearance of the ministers of righteousness, that by them this great deceiver might impose on men to their destruction: for if they appeared openly, as opposers of the Gospel and patrons of vice and impiety, they could do far less mischief; even as depredators succeed best, when disguised as honest men, and reputed to be such. But whatever their professions might be, and however they might be admired and applauded, yet their end would accord, not to their popularity, confidence, eloquence, or sentiments, but to their works, their conduct in the sight of God, and the effect of their principles among men. The plural number, used in these verses, in which the apostle directly speaks out on a subject, to which he had all along covertly referred, does not favour the opinion that one false teacher was exclusively meant, though one might possess greater influence than the others.

V. 16—20. Having thus openly decided against those, who persisted in opposing his authority at Corinth, the apostle again returned to his subject. He desired that no man would esteem him to be a fool, or a vain-glorious man, on account of what he said in his own behalf, when the importance of the occasion demanded it of him: yet, if they would form so unfavourable a conclusion concerning him, let them at least receive him in that character, while he boasted himself for a short time, and as to some things in which he was really distinguished: for he sought their good, and not his own credit, in what he said. He did not indeed speak on this occasion according to the general precepts or example of the Lord, or what was proper to be imitated in ordinary cases; nor was it an immediate revelation that he was about to declare: but he followed that same confidence of boasting, which their conduct had imposed upon him, and which the example of some among them seemed to authorize; though they would perhaps deem it foolish in him to do it. As, however, many of them, both the deceivers and the deceived, had got into this habit of glorying, "he would glory also;" but on other ground and in another manner, in order to counteract the pernicious tendency of their vain confidence.—Well satisfied indeed with their own wisdom, they were accustomed to bear, with a self-complacent joy, the conduct of those who acted foolishly; and had, no doubt, often looked down on him with this mixture of pity and contempt. They had not indeed greatly shown their wisdom in tolerating the false teachers; for they endured it without complaint, at least without being undeceived, if any one brought them into an abject dependence on him, and enslaved their consciences to his unwarranted impositions: if he devoured their substance, (as the Pharisees did the widow's houses,) by exorbitant demands under covert specious pretexts; if he took large sums from them by way of presents; if he exalted himself, as some absolute ruler over them, and behaved in the most insolent manner; nay, if he even smote them on the face, as treating them with contempt and disdain, in his furious passion. Doubtless, this refers to facts known to the apostle, in which the violent, litigious, ambitious, selfish temper of the false apostles had been evident to all men: yet they were still allowed to retain their influence, through the fascination of their eloquence, confidence, and crafty management of their deluded admirers! Glory after the flesh. This is, by most expositors, without any clear proof, explained of the false teachers glorying in their Jewish extraction and in circumcision. But the expression, "after the flesh," according to the apostle's language, implies every thing that an unregenerate man can possess; and learning, eloquence, and various other distinctions may be meant, whether the Jewish extraction and circumcision be included or not. 'If subjection to the Jewish rites had been that which the 'apostle was so zealous against, he would have spoken 'more plainly and warmly, as we see in the epistle to the 'Galatians; and not have touched it only by the by slightly, in a doubtful expression. Besides, it is plain, that no 'such thing was yet attempted openly; only St. Paul was 'afraid of it.' (Locke.)

V. 21, 22. The apostle referred, in what he had said, to the reproaches which these deceivers had cast upon him and his friends, as if he had been weak and timid in his conduct at Corinth. They ascribed his modesty, meekness, and self-abasement, to a want of courage, and a consciousness that he had no apostolical authority, or no power to enforce it. Yet, in whatever particular any man was bold, as a Christian, a minister, or an apostle, he was bold also; though, in avowing this, he did what on other occasions would be foolish. Commentators generally suppose, that in what follows he meant to compare himself with the false teacher or teachers at Corinth; and infer, that these were Hebrews, and wanted to impose the law on the Gentile converts; of which no trace is found in either epistle. (Note, xii. 17—21.) But I apprehend that the whole passage will appear far more natural and animated, if we understand it with reference to "the "chiefest of the true apostles," and the words, "where-"in soever any is bold," obviously lead to this interpretation. It was indeed a small matter for him, to show that he was superior to "the ministers of Satan," whom he had just condemned: indeed, how could he speak of them as the ministers of Christ? but, in order to re-establish completely his apostolical authority, he must prove that he was not "a whit behind the chiefest apostles:" and in fact he here shows, that he laboured and suffered more abundantly than they all, or than any of them did. All the apostles were descended from Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. They were neither Hellenists, nor proselytes; and St. Paul was not inferior to them in this respect; though his birth at Tarsus might give some persons occasion to conclude that he was. He had declared that his opposers at Corinth were not ministers of Christ, but of Satan, and he could scarcely seem to speak foolishly, in magnifying his office, and declaring that he was more than they; but it had indeed this appearance, when he proceeded to show that in some respects he was more distinguished, as the minister of Christ, than any other person, even among the apostles; not by superior authority, abilities, miraculous powers, zeal, or holiness; but by his more abundant labours and sufferings, in which he evidently far exceeded all other ministers of Christ on earth. The false apostles had laboured very little, and, instead of suffering for the Gospel, it is very probable that they had risen to eminence, affluence, and authority, by means of it; but by thus showing himself in these things to be distinguished above all the other apostles, he tacitly pointed out to the false teachers, and their followers, in what true pre-eminence consisted; and by the contrast made it appear, that those things, in which they gloried, were indeed their shame, (Note, Matt. xx. 25—28.)

V. 23—27. The other apostles had indeed been scourged and imprisoned for Christ's sake; yet Paul had endured this pain and disgrace more frequently than they, and had been in danger of death on far more occasions. The Jews had scourged him five times, with the utmost severity of which their law and custom allowed: for they were forbidden to exceed forty stripes, and for fear of a mistake, they always confined themselves to thirty-nine. (Marg. Ref.) He had also been thrice scourged by the command of the Roman magistrates, though contrary to their law. He had once been stoned and left for dead, but had been miraculously restored to life. He had thrice been wrecked in his different voyages, and at one time he continued a night and day in the sea, probably on a part of the wreck, in extreme cold, suffering, and peril. This was previous to his voyage to Rome, when he was again wrecked; and many of his other sufferings, recorded in the Acts of the apostles, were subsequent to the writing of this epistle. He often journeyed from one region to another amidst hardships and perils: sometimes his life had been endangered in passing rivers or deep waters, that lay in his way; sometimes by robbers, who attempted to plunder and murder him; frequently the Jews assaulted him, being enraged by his preaching to the Gentiles; then the Gentiles attempted to slay him, because his doctrine undermined their idolatry: when he was in any city, his life was in danger from the violence of the mob, or the iniquity of the rulers; in passing deserts, the wild beasts or wicked men, who infested them, exposed him to equal perils; when crossing the sea he was in danger of pirates and tempests; and even when among professed Christians, he was in peril from false brethren. Thus his life was spent in weariness, pain, and suffering; his incessant toil in preaching the Gospel, conversing with the people from house to house, writing his epistles, earning his bread, and attending to his devotions, frequently forced him to pass whole nights without rest. Often he was exposed to hunger and thirst through extreme indigence; and when he had food, his labours and religious duties led him to abstain from it. He was sometimes exposed to cold from the inclemency of the weather, and want of proper accommodations; and often had not suitable and decent raiment to cover him, when he was called to appear in public. Yet he still persevered, without fainting, in his "work of faith "and labour of love."

V. 28—30. Beside these things, which were without, and mainly related to the apostle's bodily sufferings, his mind was worn down by a multiplicity of affairs, which came upon him daily with the violence of an armed multitude, by the care of all the churches of the Gentiles planted by him and others; this lay upon him, filled him with constant solicitude, and employed him perpetually in forming and executing plans to promote their peace and prosperity, to counteract the designs of false teachers, and to order all their concerns for the best. And in this he so cordially engaged, that he was attentive to the case even of individuals; so that he might ask what single Christian in all the churches was reported to him as weak in the faith, and liable to be discouraged, with whom he did not sympathize as weak also? or who was stumbled and turned aside, and he was not fired with zeal to recover him, and with a holy indignation against those who occasioned the evil? As they had made it necessary for him to glory, so he had taken care, in glorying, not to expatiate on his gifts or the honours which he had received; but on those things which showed his exposed, despised, and suffering condition, the infirmities of his body and mind, his continual need of divine support, his persecutions, reproaches, and deliverances, and such things as implied his weakness, and the power of Christ which rested on him. Nor did he in this at all exceed strict truth, as those that gloried were apt to do; for the God and Father of our Lord Jesus, to whom the glory and praise belonged of all that was done by him, and for him, was witness that he did not lie in any particular, or in any measure. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 32, 33. The event here mentioned took place soon after the apostle entered upon his ministry, and was a specimen of what he had ever since been exposed to. We know nothing more of it than what is here recorded, and in a passage which has been already considered. (Note, Acts ix. 23—25.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12.

Ministers must on some occasions submit to the impu-

CHAP. XII.

The apostle relates his extraordinary revelations, which had rendered such humiliating experiences necessary, as constrained him to glory, only in his own infirmities and trials, and in the all-sufficient power and grace of Christ, 1—10. As his apostleship had been fully proved among them, the Corinthians ought to have recommended him, and not to have compelled him to this self-commendation, 11—13. He was about to visit them again; but was determined to adhere to his disinterested conduct; and to spend himself in fervent love to them, though they should, on that very account, love him the less, 14, 15. He shows that those, whom he had sent to them, had acted in the same disinterested manner, 16—19; and expresses his fears, that he should be humbled, as well as compelled to use severity, by finding many, who had grossly offended, and had not repented, 20, 21.

---

tation of folly, rather than neglect the care of souls: and when their hearers think their conduct, in particular cases, indiscreet, they should bear with them, especially if it spring from an excess of zeal. They may be jealous over their people with such an affectionate earnestness, as carries them beyond ordinary rules, or personal considerations, while they apprehend that their beloved children are in danger of being by any means corrupted from the simplicity of Christ: and that conduct, which many censure, may be the effect of pure and holy affections, superior to those of other men. It is their great employment and object, to promote the espousals of souls to Christ, and to preserve those, who appear to be thus espoused, from corruption in their principles, spirit, or conduct, that they may present them as a chaste virgin unto Christ. This will excite in them a jealous fear, lest Satan, who by his subtlety beguiled Eve in paradise, should deceive them also. For he hath agents of all descriptions, who are continually at work to impose upon the unstable and unwary. If then the faithful minister seem too suspicious, and become troublesome by his watchfulness and warnings, his people ought, notwithstanding, to bear with him. When any are about to leave those pastors, by whom they seem to have been espoused to Christ, they ought to inquire whether their new favourites can preach another Jesus, another Sanctifier, or another Gospel, than they have already received? And they should not endure those who, without sufficient cause, would alienate them from the instruments of God in their conversion. Christians need not wonder, if confident persons represent their faithful pastors as inferior preachers, who are destitute of erudition, eloquence, and power, or in some respects exceptionable or erroneous, as there were not wanting deceivers, who confidently said the same things of St. Paul himself! But it is far better to be "rude in "speech," yet not "in spiritual and experimental know-"ledge;" and to be manifested thoroughly in all things, as walking consistently with the Gospel, than to be admired by thousands for excellency of speech; and to be lifted up in pride, to corrupt the Church with damnable heresies, to distract it by furious contentions, and disgrace the Gospel by malignant tempers and an unholy life. So injudicious are many professed Christians, that high confidence, and the language of importance and authority, will often go further, than the most humble, meek, unassuming, and disinterested deportment! The minister, who is content to be poor, to fare hardly, to be abased, or to earn his bread, that he may exalt others by freely preaching the Gospel to them, is often consigned to neglect, as if guilty of some great offence. While others, who assume a magisterial tone, and exalt themselves, are admitted to that consequence which they assume, provided they have popular abilities, whatever their character in other respects may be. Yet it is in reality an honour to endure want, without ceasing to labour, or desiring to become chargeable, where it might prejudice men against the Gospel. On some occasions a man should determine not to be deprived of this glorying; especially if he at any time judges himself required to mention it. Thus the appearance of evil may be avoided, the mouths of gain-sayers may be stopped, an edifying example may be exhibited, and a contrast made to the conduct of mercenary deceivers. This, however, must be done in love and humility, and as in the presence of God: and it may sometimes be proper to show, that it does not result from pride, by receiving the kindness of others with grateful acknowledgments, where the same reasons do not operate. It often happens in this way, that ministers receive wages, as it were, from one set of people to do service for another: and sometimes the poorer are at the expense of maintaining those that preach to the rich. But the minister needs not scruple this, as if "he robbed other churches:" it reflects no dishonour on him, provided he only requires a decent subsistence; and it will redound to the credit and profit of those who thus supply him: yet when rich professors of the Gospel know this to be the case, they are not just, if they do not bear the burden themselves; nor generous, if they do not copy so noble an example.

V. 13—20.

Whatever fair show deceivers may make, they will seldom be found like faithful ministers, in labouring without any hope of worldly advantage or honour, from pure love to Christ and the souls of men. This is a part of the apostolical character and office, which by no means accords to the designs of false apostles and deceitful workers. The plausibility of deceivers, and the attractive form which they assume to seduce men from the simplicity of Christ, should not excite our wonder; for Satan is continually transformed into an angel of light, that, under the most specious pretences, he may fill the earth with infidelity, heresy, and ungodliness; and, under the mask of philosophy, morality, extraordinary austerity, or new revelations, he does far more mischief, than by tempting men to gross enormities. It might, therefore, have been previously supposed, that some of his ministers, transformed into the ministers of righteousness, should be inspired to copy his example; but if their end were to be according to their abilities, confidence, or notions, they would have a far better hope than they now can have, when it must be "according to their works." If then, any of them could indeed vacate the law of God, the rule of duty, and the standard of sin and holiness, they would secure an important point; but they will find it in full force at the day of judgment; the believer's works, as evidential of his faith and love, will be tried and approved by it; and they, who have habitually done evil under the profession of the Gospel, will be condemned as hypocrites. But there is an equal danger on the other side, and it serves Satan's purposes nearly as well, to set up good works against the merits of Christ, and salvation by faith and grace. In short, his ministers will be permitted to preach any doctrine, except the holy law of God, as established by faith in the righteousness and atonement of Christ, and the participation of his sanctifying Spirit; but this is the bane of every false system, and, when clearly exhibited, detects Satan, however transformed into an angel of light. We have great reason for thankfulness, that the apostle was constrained, though with many retractions, to "boast "himself a little;" for, whatever he might fear, or his enemies might say, his confidence in boasting hath thrown such light upon his ministry, character, and history, as will be instructive to the Church to the end of the world. Doubtless the Holy Spirit guided his pen, though he seemed not to speak "after the Lord;" for he did not glory in a carnal, a proud, or a false manner, as many do. Had the Corinthians been as wise as they thought themselves, he would have had no occasion to apologize to them for his conduct; for he did not require those indulgences, which they granted to their false teachers. Indeed, if faithful ministers, who flatter no man, and pay no court to any man's passions, should attempt to treat their people as some do, who, for their own ends, are in some things more complaisant, it would not be endured. It is astonishing, to see how some men bring their followers into bondage; how they devour and take of them; how they insult and reproach them as well as others; and yet how all this is borne with, excused, or palliated! For indeed their doctrine suits the lives and consciences of their hearers, and their example encourages them to similar conduct towards others. Sometimes it may be necessary to take notice of the reproaches of such men, but never to imitate their spirit or conduct.

V. 21—33.

What mere man ever united such, and so many, grounds of glorying as this apostle? How does it fill our minds with astonishment, to meditate on this brief enumeration of his labours, hardships, perils, and sufferings, during a long course of years! of his patience, perseverance, diligence, cheerfulness, and usefulness, in the midst of them! and of his attentive and fervent affection towards all the churches, and every individual believer! Next to the history of Christ himself, the dangers, persecutions, cruelty, and treachery, which this most excellent and useful servant of God, every where, and from all sorts of persons, met with, and the unkindness even of his own converts, form the severest stricture on the folly and wickedness of mankind, that ever was published. We may here see what are the chief preferments in the true Church of Christ; and we may inquire, whether on such terms we should be willing to be "not a whit behind the very chiefest "apostles?" In this glass, our utmost diligence and services appear too minute to be noticed, and our difficulties and trials can scarcely be perceived; the prospect may well shame us out of all our boastings and complaints, and lead us to inquire whether we be really engaged in the spiritual warfare, or are only called the soldiers of Christ. Here we may study patience, fortitude, meekness, and perseverance in well-doing, and confidence in God to protect, deliver, and comfort us, in every possible suffering or danger. Here we may learn to think less of our own ease, interest, indulgence, or reputation, and more of the great concerns of godliness; and to sympathize with the lighter sorrows of our brethren, even when more heavily afflicted ourselves: here we may look, till poverty, reproach, hunger, thirst, watchings, fastings, cold, nakedness, stripes, and imprisonment, appear honourable, and even special privileges, when sustained in a good cause and with a constant mind. Here we may learn to be content with food and raiment, thankful for mean and scanty provisions, indifferent about all worldly things, ardently desirous of doing good to others, and animated with the hope of success in this work, notwithstanding our manifold infirmities. These we should especially look at, if we are never constrained to glory; we should ever keep in view our obligations to the Lord, from whom all our distinctions are received; we should strictly adhere to truth, as in his presence, and we should refer all to his glory, as "the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who is blessed "for evermore."

NOTES.

CHAP. XII. V. 1—6. The peculiarity of the apostle's circumstances rendered that conduct necessary, which otherwise would not have been expedient; and which, it is probable, his opposers would censure, or even deride. He would, nevertheless, proceed to speak concerning visions of the divine glory, and revelations of heavenly things. It may be supposed that the false teachers at Corinth made high pretensions in these matters; and insinuated that Paul was not distinguished by them, as the other apostles were. In mentioning his extraordinary vision, or revelation, he modestly spoke in the third person; but there can be no doubt that he meant himself. He knew a man in Christ, (Marg. Ref.) who fourteen years before had a most extraordinary vision. Whether he was in the body or not, at that time, God alone knew; but his outward senses were entirely closed, and his whole perception was by the powers of his mind; but whether heavenly things were brought down to him, so to speak, as his body lay entranced, (as the case often seems to have been with the ancient prophets,) or whether his soul was dislodged from the body for the time, and actually taken up into heaven; or whether he was taken up in body and soul together, he knew not. (Marg. Ref.) This language evidently proves, that the apostle most firmly believed the soul to be distinct from the body, and capable of perception, activity, and enjoyment, in a state of separation.—However these things might be, this man was suddenly caught up into the third, or the highest heaven; above the lower region of the air and the starry heavens, to the place where the Lord immediately reveals his presence and glory, and receives the adoration of his heavenly hosts. Yea, this man, with whom he was so intimately acquainted, was taken up into Paradise, the place of felicity, of which Eden was the type, and there heard such words as man could not speak if he might, and as it would have been unlawful to speak if he could, it being the purpose of God, that the discoveries made of himself in that glorious world should not be more fully declared on earth than they had been. Many approved commentators suppose these to have been two distinct visions; that Paradise is a different place from the third heavens, and that in the latter he saw Jesus at the right hand of the Father, and in the former he conversed with departed saints. But, as the happiness of the "spirits of just men made perfect" consists in being "present with the Lord," there seems to be no Scriptural ground for this distinction. (Marg. Ref.) The language is indeed varied, yet only one vision appears to be intended; but in that one vision he doubtless had an abundance of revelations. Of this man, who was so highly favoured, at least equally with any of the ancient prophets, he would glory; though in himself, as to any thing that was properly his own, he would not glory, except in his infirmities. In his present circumstances, indeed, he was desirous of glorying in such matters, and of mentioning other visions that had been made to him, yet he should not act foolishly, as he could do it with perfect truth, (which probably was not the case with the false teachers.) He would, however, forbear speaking further on that subject, lest some of his friends should think more highly of him than his manifest conduct and ministry authorized, and should thus be tempted to honour him too much, and perhaps to undervalue other faithful ministers in the comparison. As fourteen years had passed, since the apostle had this astonishing vision, and he had not, as it appears, before mentioned it, he must be allowed to have been exceedingly reluctant to glory in the honour conferred on him. The vision seems to have been vouchsafed to him, especially for his own support and encouragement, amidst his various labours and sufferings; and as no revelation of divine truth, needful to be known and believed by Christians, or ministers, was made to him, it was not only impossible, but even unlawful, if it could have been done, to relate what he had heard and seen.—As two distinct words are used, it is most natural to suppose, that they were intended to convey two distinct ideas.

V. 7—10. The apostle did not forget that he was a poor sinner, wholly dependent on mercy and grace, amidst all his honourable distinctions: so that his extraordinary and multiplied revelations were soon followed by as remarkable trials, lest they should prove an incentive to spiritual pride. What he saw in the third heavens must have been in its own nature of a humbling tendency; (Job xlii. 5, 6. Is. vi. 1—5:) yet, when he came among his brethren, he would be apt to think, (however otherwise abased,) that none of them had seen, or heard, what he had seen and heard; or been favoured with such visions of God as this in the third heavens. Thus the vision might

CHAP. XIII.

The apostle declares his purpose of inflicting miraculous punishments, on those who persisted in opposing his authority, 1—4. He calls them to self-examination, 5; and to disarm him of his power to use sharpness, by their previous repentance, 6—10. He concludes with exhortations, salutations, and benedictions, 11—13.

this kind takes place in those whom he loveth, some "thorn in the flesh," will be surely given them, and some messenger of Satan let loose to buffet them; but the delusions of enthusiasts tend only to pride, without any counterpoise. It is, however, very surprising, that corrupt nature should, as it were, learn pride in heaven, and grace should be taught humility, even by Satan and his messengers. However painful the process may be, the wise Christian will be thankful to be kept from being exalted above measure, and he will be more ready to speak of his sins and follies than of his extraordinary discoveries and consolations, as he will not desire that any one should think of him above what he seeth him to be. Whatever there be in a man's experience, whether of outward trials or of inward conflicts and temptations, which tends to counterbalance more encouraging dispensations, and to mortify his pride, he may very properly consider it as a "thorn in the flesh," given to him to prevent worse consequences. And it is especially matter of gratitude, when this prevention is effected without his being left to commit actual sin, or to dishonour the Gospel. When we are buffeted by Satan, we should apply to Him who "suffered being tempted, that he might be able to succour "those that are tempted;" and we should be frequent, as well as instant, in beseeching him, that those temptations and trials may depart, which appear to impede our usefulness, or to endanger the credit of our profession. Yet we must be careful not to conclude that our prayers are rejected, when the desired deliverance is delayed, as he may see those conflicts salutary, which we deem ruinous. His wisdom must be trusted, as well as his truth and love; and when we strive against sin, bear up under discouragements, and attend to our duty, in dependence on him, we may rest satisfied "that his grace will be "sufficient for us, and that his strength will be made "perfect in our weakness." He frequently answers prayer by reconciling our minds to a humiliating trial, and by increasing our strength for that conflict which we were desirous of declining; and sometimes Christians have such views of his glory, and such confidence in his grace, that they can most gladly glory in their infirmities, assured that his power will rest upon, and be honoured in and by them. Thus a man may even take pleasure in infirmities, in reproaches, necessities, persecutions, and distresses, for Christ's sake; and though we may not have arrived at this vigour of faith and love, yet, if we are indeed believers, we have also found, that when we most felt our own weakness, we were peculiarly strong in the Lord; and when we began to think ourselves strong, we have been left to discover, and perhaps to expose, our own weakness.

V. 11—21.

They who do not give proper commendation to such as have faithfully laboured for their good, but prefer every new voice to that of their own pastors, often compel them to glory, and then perhaps censure them for it. But whatever the Lord may give us, or do by us, we are nothing in ourselves but sin and folly; so that the deepest self-abasement and self-renunciation not only consist with the consciousness of the Lord's special goodness towards us, but are intimately connected with it. It is a great thing for ministers to say before God, and to their people, "we "seek not yours, but you. Alas! in what numerous instances must the words be transposed, in order to be true, as the preachers seek only the property, and not the salvation of their hearers! But the more disinterested our labours are, the more apostolical they must be allowed to be; and it is generally desirable to avoid being burdensome to our congregations; for far more will "forgive us this "wrong," than the very appearance of being mercenary. Indeed, we should, as far as we can, imitate the conduct of affectionate parents, who seek to enrich their children, and not to be enriched by them. But how hard is it, gladly to spend and be spent for those who make unkind returns, and who seem to love those least who most love them! We are soon vanquished in contests of this kind; and may hence infer, how far short we are of the apostle's measure of grace, who yet, long after this, confessed that he had not already attained; (Phil. iii. 12, 13;) and we may thus learn to pray for an increase of faith, love, and patience. No excellency of spirit or conduct can silence calumny; and if we were even as holy as Paul, some would revile us as crafty men, who took others by guile. It is well, when we can disprove such slanders, and when fellow-labourers walk in the same spirit and steps. We should not however be too anxious to excuse ourselves, being satisfied with a clear conscience towards God, yet we ought to do all things for the edification of our brethren, and the recovery of such as have been drawn aside. But how can ministers be expected to prove such as their people desire, when they witness among them such contentions, envies, slanders, whisperings, boastings, and tumults, as not only grieve and humble them, but also disgrace the Gospel? Alas! they are often cast down, and sent to bewail the crimes of those whom they fondly hoped would be a comfort to them; and they are frequently distressed on account of their own mistakes or infirmities, which they fear have tended to prevent their usefulness. But how grievous is it, that such evils should prevail among the professors of the Gospel, and that we should still have to lament over many, who have sinned, and have not repented of the "uncleanness, and fornication, and "lasciviousness, which they have committed!" Yet we need not despond on this account, for it was so even in the apostle's days. But while we observe that "the "enemy hath done this;" we should not forget to add, that it was by means of antinomian and self-conceited teachers.

NOTES.

CHAP. XIII. V. 1—4. (Note, xii. 14.) As the law had prescribed that no accused person should be condemned, unless two or three witnesses testified against him, (Marg. Ref.) so the repeated warnings given by the apostle, of his purpose to come and inflict punishment on the impenitent offenders at Corinth, would, as it were, testify against them, and make way for those judgments. Or rather, when at length he should come, he would proceed against them according to that law, or to the rule laid down by Christ for his disciples. (Notes, Matt. xviii. 15—18.) In the former epistle he had before told them of his purpose: in the preceding part of this epistle he had again warned them, as if present with them; and here again at the conclusion, being yet absent, and giving them a little longer space to repent, he now wrote, to assure those who had already sinned and continued untractable, and all others who might countenance them, that if, or when, he came again, he would not spare the offenders, nor appear so timid and weak as they before had concluded him to be: especially as some of them boldly demanded further proof of Christ's speaking by him as his apostle; though this had already been confirmed by no feeble evidence, but by his mighty power working in and among them, in various ways. 'Christ showed his 'power among them, by enabling St. Paul to preach the 'Gospel to them, "in demonstration of the Spirit and of "power," 'so efficaciously, as to convert them to the 'faith; in that variety of gifts conferred on them, toge'ther with the Gospel, by which "the testimony of "Christ was confirmed:" 'by his power, conspicuous 'in seconding St. Paul's delivery of the incestuous Corin'thian up to Satan:' and 'by the chastisements they 'suffered for communicating in the Lord's supper un'worthily.' (Whitby.) For though Jesus was crucified, as if he had been only a weak, helpless, and contemptible man, and was despised, as unable to save himself, yet he was raised from the dead and lived in glory, through the power of God, to put all enemies under his feet. In like manner, the apostle and his brethren appeared weak and despicable, as being made like the Saviour, and the power which they spake of seemed to be dead, because they did not exercise it; yet they were assured that it would revive, and that they should be evidently quickened, and endued with the power of God, exerted in their behalf towards the disobedient Corinthians, by inflicting miraculous judgments upon them. The language here used to the refractory Corinthians contains the strongest proof imaginable, that the apostle was conscious he spake and acted by a divine authority, and that he feared no detection, and was certain that his Lord would put all his opposers to confusion.

V. 5, 6. Instead of presumptuously judging the apostle and demanding his credentials, it behooved the persons concerned, and indeed all of them, to examine themselves, whether they really "were in the faith," or not, whether they had indeed more than a formal profession and a dead faith. Let them then prove their tempers, conduct, and experience, by the standard of God's word, as gold is assayed or tried by the touchstone; for he feared that many of them were self-deceived in this important concern. After all their boasting of knowledge, would they continue ignorant of themselves, of their own state, character, and hearts? Or that Jesus Christ was indeed in them, by the in-dwelling of his Spirit, by his image renewed on their souls, by his kingdom set up in their hearts, and by possessing their supreme love and affection, unless they were to that day mere professors, who would at last be disapproved and rejected, as the dross is by the refiner? Some expositors render the clause, "Christ is "among you, except, &c." but this conveys no precise idea. The apostle could not mean to intimate, that Christ was not at all present among the Christians at Corinth; for this would have contradicted all the declarations which he made concerning them, as a Church; and the presence of Christ among them in this sense could not prove that those individuals, whom he warned, were true believers, and approved by God; but this was the precise point, which he wished them personally to examine. In determining this question, they would also decide another, as far as they were individually concerned; for as many of them, as could clearly ascertain that "Christ dwelt in "their hearts by faith," must consider themselves as living demonstrations that Paul was a true apostle, for "the seal of his apostleship were they in the Lord:" and they could not disprove his claim, without owning themselves to be without proof of conversion. He trusted, therefore, that in this way many knew that Christ had approved and owned his ministry, and all the rest would soon know this in another manner. Reprobates. 'Thus the 'apostle calls in this place; not those who are not divinely 'elected to eternal life, (for they who still continue in 'their sins, not being yet effectually called, are not directly to be considered as "vessels of wrath;" 'nor those 'who after their calling, fall into grievous sins;) but such 'as are not at present approved.' (Beza.) It does not appear to me, that either the original word, nor our English word, reprobates, is ever in Scripture used as the opposite to elect; and as to reprobation, it is, I apprehend, a Scriptural idea, (for they who are not chosen must be rejected:) but not a Scriptural word in any sense. How many declamations, then, on this subject, might be spared! (Marg. Ref.)

V. 7—10. The apostle prayed for the Corinthians, that they might do no more evil, but repent of what they had done; not that he and his friends should appear approved, by the submission of all parties to his authority, but that they might do what was right, and becoming them, though it should occasion him to be disapproved and censured: or even to be thought destitute of apostolical authority, because he had no occasion given him of exercising it. For indeed he and his brethren could do nothing in the use of these miraculous powers, against the truth of the Gospel, being invested with them only that they might defend the truth. But he loved their souls far more than his own reputation; and therefore he should be glad to be weak in this respect, by their strength of faith and grace removing all occasion of displaying his power; and indeed the great wish of his heart was for their perfect re-establishment in the faith and holiness of the Gospel, as a man is perfectly recovered from a dangerous malady, or from the breaking or dislocation of his bones.—Therefore he wrote these things before he came to Corinth, that they might have time for this complete recovery; lest contrary to his inclination, he should be compelled to use sharpness, according to his apostolical power, which the Lord had intrusted to him; that in the use of it he might promote the edification of believers, and bring sinners to repentance, and so prevent their final destruction.

V. 11—14. The apostle at length closed this most instructive epistle with his friendly salutations, and affectionate desires and prayers for the present and future welfare of the Christians at Corinth; exhorting them to be sincere, entire, established in the faith, and unreservedly the disciples of Christ; exciting them to be joyful in the Lord, and of good courage amidst all their temptations, and also to exhort and animate one another; calling on them to lay aside contentions, that they might all be of one heart and judgment, delighting in, and attending to, the same things, and living together in peace; and assuring them that in this way, "the God of love and peace," the Source and Pattern of love and peace, would manifest his presence among them and bless them. (Marg. Ref.) As a token of their mutual forgiveness and love, let them salute each other with a holy kiss. (Marg. Ref.) He assured them, that all the saints where he then was desired affectionately to salute them; and, finally, he desired that the free favour, mercy, and salvation of the Lord Jesus Christ, the special love of God the Father to them, as the objects of his choice, and his adopted children, and the participation of all the gifts, graces, and consolations of the Holy Ghost, might be with them all. That so, all blessings from the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, in whose One name they had been baptized, might really be conferred on all of them, and constantly enjoyed by all of them, without exception, to the glory of the three Persons in the Sacred Trinity, according to the parts which they sustain in the great work of man's redemption.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

All rigorous measures should be preceded by long patience and many warnings, when the case will admit of them, and with caution and deliberation, upon sure grounds, and with firmness of mind. They who will not be convinced by the abundant evidences already afforded, that Christ speaketh by his faithful ministers, will at length experience a very awful demonstration of it. These cannot appear more weak and despicable in the eyes of carnal men, than Jesus did to the chief-priests, when he hung upon the cross; yet he liveth, and exerciseth "all "power in heaven and earth;" and when he shall come to judgment, every denunciation of vengeance uttered by his servants, according to his word, will be found to be living and powerful for the condemnation of despisers.

We should therefore diligently and impartially examine ourselves, whether we are in the faith; and, instead of imagining that it is always unbelief to doubt of our acceptance, we should daily bring the whole of our faith, experience, comfort, affections, words, and works, to be assayed by the touchstone of the Scriptures, that we may get well acquainted with ourselves, obtain an assurance that will not shrink from investigation, and possess that "hope which maketh not ashamed, because the love of "God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost." For except "Jesus Christ be in us," by his Spirit, his image, and the governing power of his love, our faith is dead, and we are as yet disapproved by our Judge. While ministers give these warnings, they should also look well to themselves, that they may have a good hope that they shall not thus be rejected; but, in general, they who are most presumptuous in judging others, have most reason to suspect and examine themselves.

V. 7—13.

We should earnestly pray to God for those whom we caution, that they may "cease to do evil, and learn to do "well;" though their good conduct, "as becometh the "Gospel of Christ," should expose us to censure for our suspicions of them. We should be glad for others to be strong in the grace of Christ, though that should be the means of exposing our weakness; and we should long for the perfection of knowledge, holiness, and comfort in behalf of those who have imbibed a strong dislike to us; even if this should proportionably confirm, and increase men's prejudices against ourselves. In short, all our interests and feelings, except our present holiness and future felicity, should be despised, when they come in competition with the honour of Christ, and the prosperity of his Church. The miraculous powers of the apostles could not be used against the truth, but only in its defence; yet, abilities, gifts, authority, and influence, as well as the censures and excommunications of the Church, may be employed against the cause of Christ, and the edification of his people; yea, to the destruction of the possessors, and of others with them: we should then pray for grace to preserve us from such abuses, and to enable us, and all concerned, to make a proper improvement of all our talents.—If we would have the God of peace and love to be with us for our spiritual advantage and consolation, we should study to be steadfast in the faith of Christ, to act consistently with it, to be united in heart and soul with all our brethren, and to follow peace with all men. Then we may hope that "the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, the "love of God the Father and the communion of the Holy Spirit, will be with us all;" that through us 'glory 'may be to the Father, to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost, 'as it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be, 'world without end, Amen.' And what more can we desire for ourselves, or our brethren, than this frequently repeated apostolical benediction? May we then at all times, when these words are in our lips, or spoken in our hearing, so enter into the meaning of them, with fervent affections and enlarged desires and expectations, that the blessings implied in them may be upon us, and all our fellow-worshippers, now and for evermore! Amen.

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE
TO THE GALATIANS.

The Galatians, or Gallogrecians, were the descendants of the Gauls, who migrated from their own country, to seek for new settlements; and who, after a variety of disasters, got possession of a considerable district in Asia Minor, near to Lycaonia, Lystra, and Iconium. It is supposed, that they retained their native language and customs, at the time when the Gospel was first preached among them. Learned men have shown it to be probable, that this was, during the first progress of Paul and Barnabas, through those regions: (Acts, xiv:) for, though Galatia is not mentioned, yet, "the regions round about Lycaonia," may be supposed to include Galatia. But some attempts to fix the date of their conversion to an earlier period, are wholly destitute of scriptural proof, and unsupported by any solid argument. It is plain, that the Galatians were, generally, idolatrous Gentiles before their conversion. The apostle, was not able to spend much time among them, because of his multiplied engagements; yet he asserts, in a way which challenges refutation, that he conferred miraculous gifts on them. But soon after he left them, some professed converts to Christianity, who were zealous for the Mosaic law, intruded among them; drawing them off from the true Gospel, to depend on ceremonial observances, and to the vain endeavour of establishing their own righteousness. The way in which the apotsle, with the greatest decision and apparent severity, opposes this false Gospel, will appear as we proceed: but certainly it shows, that he considered the very, life and soul of Christianity to be at stake. Yet his opposition to this self-righteous perversion of Christianity, does not, in the smallest degree, lead him to overlook its holy and practical tendency: and, in this respect, the epistle before us forms a striking contrast to the over zealous and vehement earnestness of numbers, for a part of Christianity; while another part, of equal importance, is overlooked, if not disparaged. Learned men maintain different opinions, as to the time when this epistle was written. Most, however, agree, that the apocryphal postscript which dates it from Rome, contains a direct untruth. It is probable, that it was written during the apostle's residence at Corinth; though some fix the date of it to the time, during which the apostle abode at Antioch, after his first progress through Asia Minor with Barnabas, and after the council at Jerusalem; but before he set off the second time, with Silas and Timothy, when the decrees were delivered to the Churches. The former opinion is, however, more generally maintained; and indeed it is not certain, that the apostle had been in Galatia, before his second progress through Asia Minor: and the objection to the epistle's being written at a later period, arising from the decrees which had been sent by the apostles to the Churches, which might, it is thought, have superseded the necessity of it, seems of little weight. The apostles had indeed decided against the ceremonial law being imposed on the Gentile converts; but they had not shown that the Gentiles, by voluntarily submitting to it, went about to establish their own righteousness, and virtually renounced the Gospel. Ancyra, Pessinus, Tavium, and Germa, are mentioned by geographers, as cities of Galatia; nay, Iconium is by some numbered among them: and St. Paul is supposed to have founded the Churches in these and other cities in that district.

CHAP. I.

Paul asserts his divine appointment to the apostolical office, 1. He salutes the churches, and praises God, 2—5. He sharply reproves the Galatians for so soon turning aside to a false gospel; and denounces an awful curse on all that preached any other doctrine, than what they had received from him, 6—10. He declares that he had his authority and instructions from Christ; and shows what his conduct had been before his conversion, and what it was afterwards, 11—24.

PAUL, [a] an apostle, ([b] not of men, [c] neither by man, [d] but by Jesus Christ, [e] and God the Father, who [f] raised him from the dead;)

2 And [g] all the brethren which are with me, unto [h] the churches of Galatia:

3 [i] Grace be to you, and peace from God the Father, and from our Lord Jesus Christ,

4 Who [k] gave himself for our sins, that he might deliver us [l] from this present evil world, [m] according to the will of God and [n] our Father:

5 To [o] whom be glory for ever and ever. [p] Amen.

6 I [q] marvel that ye are [r] so soon removed from him, [s] that called you into [t] the grace of Christ, [u] unto another gospel:

7 Which is not another; [x] but there be some that trouble you, and would [y] pervert the gospel of Christ.

8 But [z] though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other Gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, [a] let him be [b] accursed.

9 As we said before, [c] so say I now again: If any man preach any other gospel unto you [d] than that ye have received, let him be accursed.

10 For [e] do I now [f] persuade men, or God? or do I seek to please men? [g] for if I yet pleased men, I should not be [h] the servant of Christ.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1, 2. (Note, Acts xiii. 1--3.) It is highly probable, that the Judaizing teachers in Galatia expressly denied Paul to be an apostle; or, at least, that he was equal to Peter and the other apostles. He therefore began his epistle by calling himself an apostle, and declaring that he was not sent forth by any human authority, nor yet by the intervention of any man, as even Matthias had been, " but by Jesus Christ, and by God the Father, who raised him from the dead." That as Christ received his mediatorial kingdom from the Father, so Paul received his apostleship from Christ, and from God the Father by him; and though he was not appointed to that office before the death of Jesus, as most of the other apostles were, yet his authority was equally valid, being personally conferred on him by his risen Lord and Saviour. Ananias baptized Paul; but he neither appointed him to the apostleship, nor instructed him for it. With him all the brethren, (probably the ministers were intended,) who were then with the apostle, joined in this epistle, as testifying the facts, and concurring in the doctrines, contained in it. ‘ Perhaps the apostle meant to distinguish himself from those, who were constituted by the apostles, and sent by them to different places, being peculiarly named evangelists. Of this kind were Timothy, Titus, Luke, and other companions of Paul, who are celebrated in his epistles, and the Acts of the apostles.’ (Beza.)

V. 3--5. The epistle was addressed " to the churches of Galatia," or the several congregations of professed Christians, which had been collected in that province; but, as they had departed from the faith in the fundamental article of justification, the apostle did not call them " saints," for he stood in doubt of them. After his usual salutation, he added, that Jesus " gave himself" a willing and sufficient sacrifice for the sins of men, " that he might deliver" all believers from the condemnation, pollution, maxims, fashions, and conduct of " this present evil world," according " to the will" and appointment " of God our Father," to whom the whole glory ought to be, and would be, referred for ever. This deliverance could not be effected consistently with the glory of God, except by the redemption of Christ, and the acceptance, reconciliation, and grace, that are through him: if then the Galatians renounced their dependence on Christ, they must continue enslaved to this present evil world, and be condemned with it, for no outward forms or observances could deliver them from it, or give them the victory over it, (1 John v. 4, 5.) Some indeed interpret the words, which we render " this present evil world," of the Mosaic dispensation, which was then become a mere carnal system, connected with the love and spirit of the world, the fear of men, bondage to sin, and exposedness to condemnation. But the preceding explanation is far more extensive and natural: most of the Galatians were Gentiles before their conversion, and even the ritual law of Moses is never called evil in Scripture, much less the whole Mosaic dispensation.

11 But I certify you, brethren, [i] that the Gospel which was preached of me, is not after man.

12 For I neither received it of man, neither was I taught it, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ.

k Acts xxii 3—5. xxvi. 4, 5.

V. 6—10. It is remarkable, in how different a manner the apostle addressed the Galatians, from what he afterwards did the Corinthians. We have seen that he used the utmost caution, and the most delicate and consummate management, in undermining the influence and counteracting the delusions of the false teachers at Corinth: but he attacked the error of the Galatians in a direct and open manner, without any circumlocution. The Corinthians had indeed "built hay, straw, and stubble" upon the good Foundation; but the Galatians were attempting to lay a wrong foundation: the former "might be saved "as by fire," notwithstanding their errors and abuses; but the latter must perish, unless recovered from their infatuation. In the former case the errors had been introduced more plausibly, and had diffused their baleful influence more gradually: the tares were so mingled with the wheat, that they could not be plucked up by a rough hand without the greatest danger, and much caution was requisite, lest Satan should get still further advantages. But in Galatia the error was simple and fundamental: it was a virtual renunciation of the Gospel, and destructive in its very nature. The persons who propagated "another Gospel" in Galatia, were as determined enemies to true Christianity, as the false apostles at Corinth, and more evidently so; but they were not equal to them in ingenuity: the detection of their error lay within a small compass; their example was of a most dangerous tendency; their progress was likely to be very rapid unless effectually checked, and therefore the apostle opened his subject in the language of astonishment at the conduct of the Galatians. He had been employed to call them by his ministry "into the grace of Christ," or a professed dependence for acceptance on the free mercy of God, through the merits and sacrifice of Christ, and by faith in him. He had fully instructed them in this important subject, and confirmed it by miracles and the gifts of the Spirit conferred on them, and they had appeared cordially to embrace this salvation: he could not therefore but be surprised, that they should so soon be induced to disclaim his ministry and renounce his doctrine, by turning to another Gospel. As it was more evident at first sight, that the Galatians had been removed from the ministry and doctrine of Paul, than it was that they had renounced Christianity, and as he stood in doubt whether they had been efficaciously called into the grace of Christ, so I apprehend we are rather to understand him as speaking of the instrument of their outward calling, than of the Agent in effectual vocation. Indeed, their new scheme was not another Gospel, nor any Gospel at all, but a most fatal delusion, shutting up under condemnation all those who adhered to it. This the apostle hoped would not be their case, as the immediate blame was to be cast on certain persons, whose aim was to trouble, perplex, and mislead the minds of the Gentile converts, and to pervert the Gospel of Christ, out of a blind and proud zeal for the Mosaic dispensation. They, no doubt, appeared to the unstable and unwary Galatians, to speak very plausibly concerning obedience to the law, as joined with faith in Christ in order to justification; but he must in the strongest and plainest terms declare, that whoever preached any Gospel contrary to that which he had preached to them, and they had received, or even added any thing to it on the grand question of justification, would be, and ought to be accursed, as one that remained under the curse of the law, and kept others under it, and as acting in direct opposition to Christ and the glory of God in his salvation. Nay, this would be, yea, let it be, the case, even if Paul himself, or any of the apostles, should depart from their former doctrine, and endeavour to establish any other foundation for a sinner's hope than they had done. Indeed, were it possible for an angel to come from heaven, and to preach a doctrine contrary to the free justification of a sinner by faith in the merits of Christ alone, he must at that moment become an apostate spirit, a rebel against God, an enemy to Christ, and accursed in himself. So that abilities, morality, plausibility, or even miracles, were not to be regarded in this case. Nor let this be considered as the language of intemperate zeal; for he would repeat it with solemnity, and again denounce accursed, by his apostolical authority, every one who thus attempted to lay so false a foundation, that they might learn to dread and abhor those delusions which they had unwarily encouraged. For could they suppose, that, after so many years of labour and suffering in the cause of Christ, he only meant to persuade men to adopt his own private sentiments that he might ingratiate himself with them, instead of pleading the cause of God, and approving himself to him? Indeed, if this had been his object, he should never have entered on the service of Christ, or so long continued in it; and if, in so fundamental a doctrine, he accommodated his discourse to the pride and prejudices of men's hearts, he could not act as the servant of Christ, who cannot be pleased with those things which suit the carnal minds and worldly wisdom of men. As the apostle became all things to all men, that he might please them for their edification, and as he even tolerated difference of sentiment and conduct, in various instances, respecting the Mosaic law; so we must conclude that this decisive language only related to that fundamental doctrine, of which he was about to treat, or to such others as are of similar evidence or importance. It does not behoove us to use the same authoritative language, or to denounce anathemas on those who differ from us; yet we may properly show men how evidently the apostle's words conclude those under the curse, who teach sinners to rely for justification, in the least measure or degree, on any thing except the righteousness and atonement of Christ. Should not be, &c. (10.) 'This is a cutting 'reproof to all those ministers, who either alter or 'conceal the doctrines of the Gospel, for fear of dis'pleasing their hearers, or to gain popularity.' (Macknight.)

V. 11—14. The reason of the awful denunciation, which the apostle had made, was contained in the assurance, that "his Gospel was not after man;" neither of human invention, nor suited to the dispositions and opinions of mankind; for he had not received it from any human teaching, but it was immediately revealed to him by Jesus Christ. This might be evidenced by facts; for they had often heard of his character and conduct in former years, when he professed the Jews' religion, and how his bigoted zeal had induced him to exceed the measure of all other opposers, in furiously persecuting the church, which he wasted as a wolf doth the sheep, or as a victorious army plunders and destroys the city which it has taken. He had also been well instructed in the religion of the Jews, and had made greater proficiency in his studies than most of those who were his equals in age, rank, and education; as well as far exceeded them in zeal for the traditions of the elders, along with the law of Moses. (Notes, Matt. xv. 1—20.) It could not therefore be supposed that he should at once, and contrary to all his interests, both embrace Christianity, and preach it first to his countrymen, and soon after to the Gentiles, without regarding the Jews' religion, unless some adequate cause had intervened to produce the extraordinary change. 'For, says he, it is well known in what school I 'was educated from my youth; namely, among the prin'cipal enemies of the Gospel. And, also, that I even 'excelled in the religion of a Pharisee; and thus, from 'being a Pharisee, I suddenly became the apostle of the 'Gentiles; so that no time intervened, in which I could 'be taught by man.' (Beza.) 'A revelation of the 'facts and doctrines of Christianity immediately from 'Christ himself, without the assistance of any human 'teacher, so wonderfully agreeing in all its branches with 'that which Christ had taught on earth, both before and 'after his resurrection, was so extraordinary an event, and 'of so great importance to those whom St. Paul visited, 'and to whom he wrote, that one cannot wonder he 'should think proper to assert it in so solemn a manner.' (Doddridge.) The marked distinction between being taught by man, and "by the revelation of Jesus Christ," is a proof of our Lord's Deity. 'In this respect, Paul 'seems to have been, in a measure, superior to the other 'apostles whom Christ instructed on earth after the 'manner of men.' (Beza.)

V. 15—24. When it pleased God, (who had chosen him to be an apostle, even from his mother's womb, and had, by his purpose, set him apart for that service,) to call him by his efficacious grace unto the knowledge and faith of the Gospel, and thus of his abundant mercy to reconcile him unto himself by Jesus Christ: and when, along with the outward extraordinary circumstances of his conversion, it had also pleased God to reveal his Son, in the glory of his Person and salvation, to his understanding and heart, to display his power, love, and grace, in the conversion of so prejudiced and violent an enemy; that he might make his name more widely known on earth, by sending him as an apostle to preach Christ to the Gentiles. (Acts xxvi. 17, 18.) When this gracious change had taken place, he immediately prepared for obedience, without consulting any sort of men, or conferring with the dictates of his own natural reason, about the consequences of his conduct to his interest, credit, ease, or life itself. He did not go up to Jerusalem to receive instructions, or to obtain a commission from those who had been apostles, before his extraordinary conversion and appointment to that service; but he proceeded to exercise his ministry without delay, and very soon went into Arabia for that purpose. Afterwards he preached at Damascus, till he was driven thence by persecution. At length after three years he went to Jerusalem, to visit Peter as a brother in Christ, to confer with him, and to relate the gracious dealings of God, and what he had wrought by him; but neither he nor James attempted to add any thing to the instructions or authority that he had received from the Lord; and for the entire truth of all that he had stated, he solemnly appealed to God. After a short time he left Jerusalem; and the other churches in Judea did not so much as

CHAP. II.

The apostle shows for what purpose he, after many years, went up to Jerusalem, 1, 2; and that Titus, who attended him, was not circumcised, on purpose to assert the freedom of the Gentile converts from the law, 3—5. No additional knowledge was communicated to him by the other apostles; but they acknowledged his divine mission to the Gentiles, 6—10. At Antioch, he openly withstood Peter, who dissembled, as to communion with the Gentile converts, for fear of those from among the Jews, 11—13; expostulating with him, because he who himself sought justification by faith in Christ, led others to seek it by the works of the law, 14—16. The apostle by the law was become dead to the law, that he might live to God; and thus neither made Christ the minister of sin, nor frustrated the grace of God, 17—21.

know him personally; but the account of his wonderful conversion excited them to adore the power and grace of God towards so terrible a persecutor; and to bless his name for so great a deliverance vouchsafed to his afflicted Church. (Notes, &c. Acts ix. 1—31.) Separated, &c. (15.) 'This further includes a purpose from God to call 'him from heaven, in the midst of his madness against 'Christians; and his foresight that he would immedi'ately convert at his call; which two being first supposed, '(in God's eternal purpose and prescience,) it must needs 'follow to be an act of his unmerited free-choice from all 'eternity. But this was a designation only to the apostolical office, &c.' (Hammond.) This, however, shows that God's eternal purpose, and his prescience, do not interfere with man's free agency and responsibility. St. Paul would not have ascribed his conversion to himself, but to the grace of God; and so would the compilers of our articles, 'they, through grace, obey the call.' In me. (16.) This may be rendered to me. The same preposition is used just after, and translated among, it might be to, the heathen. The apostle, however, speaks of immediate prophetical revelation; and not of ordinary divine teaching. James, &c. (Marg. Ref.) 'Since we are 'told, (Acts ix. 19;) that after Saul recovered his sight 'and strength, he was certain days with the disciples 'at Damascus, during which he preached Christ in the 'synagogues; we must admit, that he spent a few 'days in preaching at Damascus, and then retired into 'Arabia, to receive further revelations, &c.' (Macknight.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—5.

All authority and ability to preach the Gospel must come from Jesus Christ, and from God the Father, who hath raised him from the dead. In all ordinary circumstances, indeed, men are employed as instruments in qualifying and ordaining ministers; but, without the grace, teaching, and unction of the Spirit of Christ, all the rest must prove ineffectual. We ought to pray for "grace and "peace from God the Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ," in behalf even of those of whom we doubt whether they be true saints. The love of Christ, in giving himself for our sins, and the hopes and motives which his redemption inspires, are effectual to deliver the believer from this present world, as well as from the wrath to come. This was intended by the divine Redeemer: it accords to the will of God, and is requisite for the display of his glory; and the consciousness of being rescued and separated from those who were our companions in sin, made victorious over the fear of men and the love of the world, enabled to refuse conformity to it, and to live a spiritual and heavenly life on earth, forms the proper evidence of justification in the righteousness of Christ and through faith in him; yet numbers, who profess evangelical doctrines, have no inclination to this part of salvation. But, as they are not delivered from this present evil world by the sanctification of the Spirit, it is presumptuous in them to expect exemption from its condemnation by the blood of Jesus.

V. 6—10.

It is truly astonishing, how soon hopeful converts are often removed from the ministry of those by whom they were first "called to the grace of Christ;" and how easily they are induced to embrace other Gospels, either more flattering to self-righteous pride, or more favourable to self-indulgence. These, indeed, are not the Gospel, but the devices of Satan to deceive the unstable, to trouble the injudicious, and to pervert Christianity. While we strenuously maintain, that every kind and degree of Antinomianism eventually tends to dishonour Christ and destroy true religion, we must also declare, in the most decided manner, that all dependence on good works, real or supposed, for justification, is still more fatal to the individuals who persist in it, after the truth has been fully and repeatedly set before them. No wonder that the preachers of morality and good works, as the foundation for the sinner's hope of acceptance, or in any degree conducive to his justification, are so evidently unsuccessful in their attempts to make men virtuous; for if they had apostolical endowments, yea, angelic capacities, eloquence, and purity, as they, their whole system, and all who cleave to it, lie under the awful and explicit curse of God, this must blast all their labours, and finally ruin their souls, unless they are previously convinced of their fatal mistake. While we zealously preach and diligently practice good works for evangelical purposes, let us be even still more careful, if possible, not to put them in the place of "that righteousness of God, which is unto and "upon all that believe;" and not to advance any thing which may betray others into so dreadful a delusion. Instead of presumptuously applying the apostle's words to those who differ from us, or in any other way than by a general declaration of the truth, let us for ourselves keep at the utmost distance from this terrible anathema, and caution all men against those who thus pervert the Gospel of Christ. In so important a cause we must not regard the friendship or fear the frowns of men, nor seek their favour by the persuasive words of human wisdom; but be satisfied with desiring the acceptance and blessing of God, in our endeavours to vindicate his truth. Indeed, none are the servants of Christ, who seek to please men, as their object; and few, who actually please men in general, give sufficient evidence that they honestly and faithfully serve Christ; for how can he be pleased with that testimony and conduct which is acceptable to carnal men, in whom the god of this world dwells and works? Ministers therefore should be careful not to receive or preach a carnalized gospel, and not to rest in human teaching; but to study the written revelation of Jesus Christ, and to pray continually for the Spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of him.

V. 11—24.

The conversation of many eminent Christians and ministers was once most contrary to the truth and grace of the Gospel. Zealous Pharisees and furious persecutors have been made monuments of the Redeemer's power and love; and though their apparent profiting before their conversion only tended to their greater condemnation, yet it hath afterwards been over-ruled for the glory of God, and their more abundant usefulness. The Lord suffers many whom he hath chosen for his work to proceed in opposition to him for a course of years; but when he calls them by his grace, and reveals the glory and preciousness of Christ to their souls, their enmity is subdued, their lusts dethroned, their hearts changed, and they willingly devote themselves to his service. When his command is concerned, they will not confer with flesh and blood, but will renounce all worldly prospects, and venture all consequences for his sake. And though in ordinary cases it would be presumptuous for new converts, or young ministers, to disregard the counsels of such as have been long employed in the work of Christ, yet that love to Christ and the souls of men, which renders them superior to lucrative considerations, and ready to endure hardships in order to spread the Gospel, is a good evidence that the Lord is preparing them for future usefulness. In speaking of the Lord's dealings with us, and the services for which he hath enabled us, we should scrupulously adhere to the truth, as in the sight of God; and when they, who opposed and would have destroyed the faith, are brought to embrace and preach it, we are called upon to glorify God on their behalf, though they be unknown by face to us.

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1—5. It appears from the history, that Paul and Barnabas went up from Antioch, to carry the alms of the Christians in that city to the elders at Jerusalem, (Acts xi. 29, 30.) But they had, at that time, no special business with the apostles, and it is not certain that they saw any of them. The journey, however, here mentioned, most evidently is that recorded by the historian, when they went up on purpose about the very question which St. Paul was here debating with the Galatians. (Notes, Acts xv.) Most expositors date this journey fourteen years after the apostle's conversion, which scarcely allows sufficient time for all the intervening transactions; and it seems more obvious to compute the years from the first journey before-mentioned. (i. 18.) There is, however, but little certainty in the computation of times, even by the most learned chronologers, as to the date of the apostle's conversion, subsequent history, and the writing of his epistles; and exactness in this respect is comparatively of little importance. By the direction of God, who immediately revealed himself to the apostle, or some other prophet, on this occasion, he and Barnabas went to Jerusalem about this very question; and this was the only instance in which there had been the least appearance of inferiority in him to the other apostles. At that time he fully declared the whole of his Gospel among the Gentiles, to them and to other eminent persons at Jerusalem; but he did this privately, lest, if he had openly avowed it to the whole Church, the strong prejudices of the multitude against him and the Gentiles, and for the Mosaic law, should have excited commotions, and led to such measures as might have tended to prevent his future usefulness, and subvert the Churches which he had already planted. It would at length be fully known both that he admitted the Gentiles into the Church without circumcision, and that he did not consider the Mosaic law as binding on the consciences even of the Jewish converts. But, as his object was to obtain the sanction of the Church at Jerusalem to his doctrine, in order to silence the Judaizing teachers, it was very prudent to open the business privately to the apostles, that, being proposed and supported by them, it might come before the other elders with more weight than Paul himself could give it, in so prejudiced an audience. Yet, while he used this precaution, he would not consent that Titus should be circumcised, contrary to his judgment and inclination: and it is probable, that he took that excellent Gentile convert with him on purpose, that, in the case of one on whom he could depend, he might show his steadfastness to his principles, on so critical an occasion. (Notes, Acts xvi. 3.) For both his journey to Jerusalem and his conduct there, especially in respect of Titus, were intended to counteract the designs of the false brethren, the pretended Christians, who had, in an unsuspected manner, got admission into the Church at Antioch; and who came as spies to observe the degree of liberty, which the Gentile converts, and even those of the Jews, used, in respect of the law, according to the truth and will of Christ: in order that they might bring the Gentiles into bondage to the legal ceremonies, as well as oblige the apostle and his coadjutors to be more observant of them. He was indeed always disposed to make allowance for men's prejudices, and to deal gently with weak consciences, in order to promote the Gospel, (Notes, 1 Cor. ix. 19—23:) but he would not give place at all, by way of subjection to the law, when they imposed it on men's consciences, and represented it as necessary to salvation. Nay, he strenuously opposed all such attempts, in order that the truth of the Gospel, which these Jewish teachers were labouring to pervert and corrupt, might remain in the Gentile churches.

V. 6—10. The false brethren disparaged Paul, as if no account was to be made of him; but Peter, James, and John, seemed to be somewhat in their estimation, in order that by using their names they might the more successfully oppose the truth: for the opinion of others concerning them, not their own estimate of themselves, is exclusively meant. But the apostle declared, that it was no matter to him what they or others were, as to their endowments, authority, or reputation: for God did not thus partially accept of men's persons, or determine right and wrong, truth and falsehood, by such rules. However, therefore, he loved and honoured them as brethren, he would not put them in Christ's stead, or acknowledge that they had any authority over him: nor indeed, when he conferred with them, had they added any thing to his knowledge of the Gospel, or authority to preach it, or even to his spiritual gifts and miraculous powers. On the contrary, they were convinced that Christ had immediately appointed him to be his principal minister, in preaching the Gospel among the Gentiles; even as Peter was the leading person in the work carrying on among the Jews: and had qualified him as fully, and wrought by him as mightily, in the one case, as he had by Peter in the other. So that these three apostles, who seemed to many persons to be the only pillars on whom every thing depended, saw and acknowledged the grace of God bestowed on him, and allowed of him and Barnabas, as fellow-labourers of equal authority and ability with themselves; being satisfied that they should labour principally among the Gentiles, while themselves would at present continue among the Jews. Only, considering the low condition of the Jewish converts, and the expenses which they had incurred soon after the day of Pentecost, they desired them to remember, and raise some contributions for their poor, among the Gentile converts; which Paul was very ready to do, and accordingly did without delay, and with great earnestness, notwithstanding their prejudices against him. The event of this conference in other respects was well known.

fied by the works of the law, [a] but by the faith of Jesus Christ, even [b] we have believed in Jesus Christ; that we might be justified by the faith of Christ, and not by the works of the law: [c] for by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified.

17 But if [d] while we seek to be justified by Christ, we ourselves also [e] are found sinners, [f] is therefore Christ the minister of sin? [g] God forbid.

18 For [h] if I build again the things which I destroyed, I make myself a transgressor.

19 For I [i] through the law am [k] dead to the law, [l] that I might live unto God.

20 I am [m] crucified with Christ: [n] nevertheless I live; yet not I, [o] but Christ liveth in me: and [p] the life which I now live in the flesh, [q] I live by the faith of [r] the Son of God, [s] who loved me, and gave himself for me.

21 I [t] do not frustrate the grace of God: for if [u] righteousness come by the law, then [x] Christ is dead in vain.

V. 11—16. The wisdom of God, in permitting the transaction here recorded, is very conspicuous; for it demonstrably proves the pope's pretended infallibility and supremacy, as derived from Peter, (no one can tell in what manner,) to be the most groundless fiction imaginable; and it tends exceedingly to establish the doctrine of justification by faith alone. After the decree of the council at Jerusalem, Peter on some account went down to Antioch, and, knowing that the Mosaic law was no longer obligatory on the conscience, he did not scruple to eat and converse freely with the Gentiles: yet when certain Jewish converts came from James to him, he separated from the Gentiles, lest he should incur the censure of the Jews. Thus he showed more fear of man, than regard to the truth of the Gospel; he confirmed the prejudices of the Jewish converts, and strengthened the hands of the Judaizing teachers; he weakened the influence of St. Paul and other ministers; he set an example of dissimulation, which was followed by the other Jews, and which even seduced Barnabas himself, who had been St. Paul's coadjutor among the Gentiles; and he threw additional hindrances in the way of their conversion. This sufficiently proved him to be both fallible and sinful in himself, though he was guided by the Spirit of God to deliver the Gospel to mankind, free from error or corrupt mixture. As, however, he was so evidently blameable, Paul, though probably a much younger man, and called to the apostleship long after him, deemed himself bound openly to withstand him. A private remonstrance would not suffice on so public and important an occasion; and he would not speak against him behind his back. But he took an opportunity, in the presence of the whole Church, to expostulate with him concerning his disingenuous conduct; demanding of him, how it was that he, being a Jew, should in many respects and on many occasions live like the Gentiles, without observing the Mosaic law? and yet should inconsistently employ the influence of his example, to induce, and even to compel, the Gentile converts to submit to circumcision and obey that law? For they, who were naturally of the stock of Israel, and thus had been born and educated Jews, and who had formerly been strictly observant of the Mosaic law, and not idolatrous sinners like the Gentiles, being at length fully convinced, that a man could not be justified before God by his own obedience, in any sense, (Notes, &c. Rom. iii,) but that this blessing must be obtained by the faith of Jesus Christ, even they had renounced all dependence on the law, and fled to Christ by faith, that they might be justified in him alone, without the works of the law. Why then should Peter and other Jewish converts draw the attention of the Gentiles to the legal ceremonies, and intimate to them, that they were not fully brought into the Church of Christ, because they did not submit to them, when this served to sanction those teachers, who instructed them to depend upon them in part at least for justification? Whereas they well knew, that by the works of the law no flesh could be justified before God. The occasion of this declaration was doubtless taken from the ceremonial law: but the argument, as it respects justification, is equally conclusive against all dependence on the works of the moral law, as absolutely inconsistent with the Gospel-method of justification. This certainly took place some years before the apostle's last journey to Jerusalem, as recorded by St. Luke, and it is an additional argument in support of the view before given of St. Paul's conduct on that occasion. (Note, Acts xxi. 18—26.) The conduct of Peter, on this trying occasion, seems to have been peculiarly excellent. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 17—21. It is not agreed, whether the apostle's address to Peter continues to the end of the chapter; or where it terminates, if it does not: but the doctrine is just the same, however this may be decided. If then, while the apostles renounced their legal confidence, and sought to be justified by Christ, it should at length be found that they were yet in their sins, through the insufficiency of his righteousness and atonement to justify them, except they returned back to the law, and taught others to do the same, it would follow, that Christ was "the minister of sin," and the Gospel "the ministration "of condemnation," instead of the ministration of the Spirit and of righteousness. But, God forbid that such things should be spoken of Christ, and his Gospel! This appears to be the meaning of the verse, as it stands connected in the apostle's argument. At first sight indeed it may seem rather to relate to the sins which are found in those, who profess to be justified by Christ; which are not to be charged on the doctrine, or the insufficiency of his grace to sanctify them, as if he were the minister

CHAP. III.

The apostle sharply reproves the Galatians for departing from that doctrine, which had been fully preached to them, and confirmed by the gift of the Holy Spirit, 1—5. He proves his doctrine concerning justification, from the example of Abraham, and the testimony of scripture, 6—9; from the tenour and curse of the law, and the redemption of Christ, 10—14: and from the Abrahamic covenant, which the law could not disannul, 15—18. He shows the subserviency of the law to the covenant of grace; being as a shoolmaster to prepare men for Christ, 19—24; and that all believers are delivered from the law, and made the spiritual seed of Abraham, 25—29.

of sin, and allowed men to continue in it; or as if there was any need to go back to the law on that account. The former interpretation, however, is most approved, and indeed justly. If then Paul, or the other apostles, should, either by doctrine or example, countenance the opinion, that the law must be obeyed, in order to justification, thus building again what they had destroyed, they would become transgressors, and liable to condemnation. And if the Jewish Christians should return back to a dependence on the law, they would vainly attempt to erect again that old building, which they had destroyed, in order to make Christ their Foundation. (Notes, Rom. x. 1—4.) which would again bring them under condemnation, and leave their sins both unpardoned and unsubdued. But this was very different from the apostle's own experience in this matter: for through his knowledge of the strictness, extent, spirituality, excellency, and sanction of the moral law, as well as of the typical import of the ceremonies, he was become "dead to the law;" he expected no help from it in the matter of justification; he was divorced from it as a legal covenant, that he might welcome Christ and his salvation. The union betwixt him and the law, in this sense, was finally dissolved, as the marriage relation is by death. He hoped and feared nothing from it, any more than a dead man did from his friends or his enemies. But the effect of this was not a careless, lawless life: on the contrary, this was necessary, in order that he might live to God, and be accepted by him, and devoted to him, through the motives, encouragements, and grace of the Gospel. Indeed, he was even crucified with Christ; the demands of the law on him had been answered by his Surety, in his obedience unto the death upon the cross; and his union with Christ had made him die to all legal dependences, as well as to the love and friendship of the world, the delights and interests of sin, and all those carnal principles from which his former activity arose.—Nevertheless, he lived in a new and evangelical hope, by the communication of a divine life to his soul, by new capacities of enjoyment, and new motives and principles of action. Yet it was not so much he that lived, as Christ who lived in him by his Spirit, and his power and grace, regulating his judgment and affections, transforming him into his own image, and employing him as the instrument of his glory. So that the life, which he then lived in the body, surrounded with worldly objects and temptations, was not conducted upon carnal principles, or by a regard to external things, but by faith in the Son of God; as he depended on him for all things, and aimed to do all according to his will and in subserviency to his glory. And to this he was influenced by the consideration, that this glorious Saviour had loved him when a bitter persecutor, and had given himself a sacrifice for his sins. So that, though he neglected no acceptable obedience, and declined no self-denying service, yet he attended to all his duties from such principles and for such purposes, that he did not frustrate or set aside the grace of God, by attempting in any measure to justify himself by his works; being fully assured, that if righteousness could have been obtained by any obedience of man to the law, consistently with the glory of God, then Christ had died without any necessity, and to no purpose. As, therefore, no Christian could suppose, that so stupendous a plan as that of redemption was formed and executed without any occasion; so it must also be concluded, that righteousness could, in no degree, be obtained by a sinner, on account of his obedience to the law. This holds equally true of the moral, as of the ceremonial law. It was of small moment whether men observed the latter, or not, except as they depended on it: and the concluding part of the apostle's argument related to the moral law, at least equally with the ceremonial. (Notes, Rom. vi.) "I through the law "have died by the law, so that I must live by God." (19.) 'We all, through breaking law, have died by the curse of 'law, so that if we live, we must live by the free gift of 'God, and not by law.' (Macknight.) If this learned and laborious writer had made it clearly intelligible, what he meant by 'have died by the curse of the law,' his novel interpretation would have required further notice.—But the author owns himself unable to affix any precise meaning to the words used in this and in several places of his translation and paraphrase; and certainly the word breaking is here a direct addition to the text, which is not at all necessary, or indeed admissible.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10.

While we simply depend upon God to prosper our labours, we should use every prudent method of obviating misapprehensions, and counteracting the designs of opposers, "lest by any means we should run in vain;" and this may commonly be connected with decided firmness in important cases. False brethren and teachers are generally brought in unawares; we must expect spies in our congregations, who come on purpose to find something to cavil at or object to, in order to deprive us of our Christian liberty, by bringing us into bondage to legal terrors or human impositions, or, through extravagant notions of liberty, to keep men in slavery to sin and Satan. We must not give place, in such matters, "by way of sub"jection," in any measure; lest the truth of the Gospel should be obscured or disgraced. False brethren often pretend an undue regard to some ministers of established reputation, in order to run down others of equal ability and faithfulness, whose line of duty requires them to proceed in a somewhat different manner. But they should be shown, "that God accepteth no man's person;" and that all the servants are as nothing, in comparison of their common Lord, who will never approve of those who "call any man master upon earth," that they may disparage others, who are labourers together with him. The question is not, who said or did such and such things; but merely, what was said and done, and whether it accords to the word of God, or not? Frequently those ministers, whom captious or injudicious persons magnify against others, in conference, add nothing to them: nor indeed do they materially differ from them; except as the different descriptions of men, among whom they labour, induce them to conduct their work with some apparent variation. And they generally see that God hath called them to their different spheres of usefulness, and become mutually desirous, by love and good offices, to strengthen each other's hands; while many ignorantly suppose, or maliciously pretend, that they are opposing one another. But whether our differences be real or imaginary, we should all be forward to remember the poor; especially such as have impoverished themselves for the sake of the Gospel, even should they retain any prejudices against us.

V. 11—16.

"The fear of man bringeth a snare," to an extent which few are fully aware of; and we need not wonder to see pious persons ashamed or afraid openly to countenance those, whom they inwardly favour; or boldly to avow themselves on controverted points, when their opinions are unpopular; for even Peter was induced thus to prevaricate! But even a man equal to an apostle, or "the "chiefest of the apostles," who "walks not uprightly "according to the Gospel," is to be blamed, and withstood to his face, when the matter is evident and important: for the more eminent he is, the greater mischief will follow from the example; so that other distinguished persons will be carried away by such a sanctioned dissimulation. Public offences must be publicly reproved, that the evil may be effectually counteracted. We must cease from man, and know no one after the flesh, if we would follow the Lord fully; for "verily every man in his best "estate is altogether vanity." Christ is the only infallible Head of his Church: all pretenders to this title on earth are antichrists; and they who cannot endure to be blamed, or to acknowledge themselves mistaken, are of a very unchristian temper. Men are seldom aware of the magnitude, or fatal consequences, of their errors or carnal compliances; yet they should be fairly pointed out to them, that they may be put upon their guard. Whatever be our nation, religious profession, education, or outward character; yet, if we are real and established Christians, we know that "by the works of the law shall no flesh be "justified:" this conviction hath led us to believe in, and rely on, Christ, that we might be justified by faith in him: and whilst we adhere to this principle, all our worship and obedience will be entirely disregarded in the grand concern of our justification, and be wholly performed from other motives and to other purposes.

V. 17—21.

We should make Christ the minister of sin, were we to suppose that his merits were insufficient to justify the believer; even as others make him the minister of sin, by allowing themselves in disobedience, from a presumptuous confidence of being justified by his righteousness, and saved without being sanctified. The believer, through the law, is become "dead to the law," not that he may continue in sin, but that "he may live unto God," (Notes, Rom. vi. vii.) and the more simply he relies on Christ for every thing, the more devotedly does he walk before him in all his ordinances and commandments. He is crucified with Christ to the world and sin, as well as to all legal dependences; he is united with Christ and conformed to him; he, as it were, rises, lives, and ascends with him; yea, Christ lives and reigns in him, and speaks and acts by him: and, as far as he is brought under this sacred influence, his words and works resemble those of his Lord, and all his powers are employed in his service. He lives here on earth by faith in the Son of God, which worketh by love, induceth obedience, and effects a progressive transformation into his holy image: and this proportionably enables him to use the language of full assurance, and to say, "he loved me, and gave himself "for me." Thus he neither abuses nor "frustrates the "grace of God;" for this proposition, "that if right"eousness come by the law, then Christ is dead in "vain," is the bane of all self-justifying schemes, however refined or ingenious they be: and all, who cleave to them, would certainly have deemed this language to be enthusiasm, if the apostle had not used it as his own experience, and if it had first been spoken by some zealous modern defender of the doctrine of grace, against the objections of Pharisees and the perversions of Antinomians.

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1—5. Having authenticated his ministry and doctrine by the statement of facts, the apostle proceeded more directly to argue the point with the Galatians, whom he sharply reproved, as destitute of wisdom and understanding, in thus unaccountably turning away from the truth of Christ. He demanded, therefore, who had fascinated them by the sorcery of their insidious insinuations? Who had induced them to refuse obedience to the truth, which required them to seek justification by faith in Christ alone? For it certainly could be owing to nothing less than fascination for them to seek it by the works of the law, seeing the Gospel had been so fully explained and earnestly enforced upon them; and all things relating to the sufferings of Christ, and the need, motive, intenseness, and benefit of them, had been set before them in so pathetic, affectionate, and lively a manner, by the preaching of the Gospel and the administration of the Lord's supper, that Jesus Christ had, as it were, been evidently set forth as crucified before their eyes and in the midst of them. And could it be imagined that the impressions which seemed to be thus made upon their minds should so soon be utterly erased? The argument, however, might be reduced to a very compendious decision: he only desired to know from them, whether they had received the miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit by the laying on of the hands of those preachers who proselyted them to the Jewish law, or from him who brought them the joyful report of free salvation by faith in Christ. As they must know that they received these gifts by him, and not by their legal teachers, could they be so absurd as to suppose that they had indeed begun to worship and serve God, in a spiritual and acceptable manner, by the preaching of a doctrine warranted by the Holy Spirit, but that the work had been left imperfect, and was now to be completed by teachers who possessed no miraculous powers, at least could impart none to others; and who only instructed them in mere external ordinances, a bodily exercise, of which carnal men were as capable as the most spiritual man on earth! They had endured many persecutions, especially from the Jews; and would they at length prove their profession of Christianity to be vain, and lose all the benefit of their sufferings, by renouncing the grace of the Gospel, to rely in part at least on legal observances? The apostle hoped that it would not yet be thus in vain; but it certainly must be so, unless they could be recovered from the fatal mistake. He must therefore again demand of them, Whether the supply of the Spirit and miraculous powers had been given them from the Lord, by means of the preachers of legal observances, or by the ministers of the Gospel? This open appeal to the Galatians, who were under the influence of such as opposed the apostle's authority, is a strong demonstration that these gifts were actually communicated to them by his ministry. The abruptness and repetitions of his questions prove that his mind was greatly agitated by their misconduct, and show how important he deemed their mistake; and we cannot doubt but that he regarded all their profession and sufferings to have been altogether in vain, in case they persisted in it. This is of vast importance in the argument; for submission to the ceremonial law, though burdensome, would not have been a renunciation of the Gospel, if it had not implied a dependence on their own works, instead of Christ's righteousness and atonement; and this dependence must be equally incompatible with the grace of the Gospel, even when the obedience itself is necessary from other motives, and for other purposes.

V. 6—14. (Notes, Gen. xv. 6. Rom. iv.) The example of Abraham was sufficient to determine that they, who expected justification by faith alone, were his children, and interested in the blessings promised to him; and the Holy Spirit, who inspired the writers of the Scriptures, foreseeing the calling of the Gentiles, and their justification by faith in Christ, preached the Gospel to Abraham in few words, when it was said, "In thee m Rom. vi. 19. 1 Cor. xv. 32. 15 Brethren, [m] I speak after the manner of men; Though [n] it be but a man's n Heb. ix. 17.

" shall all nations be blessed;" that is, ' By virtue of ' their relation to the promised Seed, which shall descend ' from thee, sinners of all nations shall, by faith, be made ' completely happy in the favour of God and the enjoyment ' of everlasting life.' So then they who sought acceptance in this way of believing were blessed after the example of believing Abraham; but as many as were induced to seek acceptance by their own obedience to the works of the law, and all who in any way remained under that covenant, abode under the curse, according to the testimony of the law itself. (Note, Deut. xxvii. 26.) The passage here quoted, follows a variety of curses denounced against transgressors of the moral law; which shows that this was principally referred to. Indeed, the legal dispensation, considered as a covenant of works, was intended: believers always were under the covenant of grace by faith in the Saviour, as promised from the beginning, and prefigured by the sacrificing of innocent animals; unbelievers always made the whole a complex covenant of works; and the nation of Israel was under the Sinai-covenant, in respect of the land of Canaan and their peculiar privileges. But after the promulgation of the Gospel, the whole became entirely a covenant of works, even as much as that of Adam; and under such a covenant, in one form or other, all men continue as the rational and accountable creatures of God; and, being transgressors of his law, even according to their own obscure notions of it, they are exposed to the curse and wrath of God, and remain under it, unless they believe in Christ. But as the apostle was arguing with Judaizers, so he led their attention to the written law itself, which could not confer the blessing, but must denounce the curse upon them, for they had not " confirmed it," or " continued" from the beginning of their lives " in all " things written in the law," so as to perform a perfect obedience to them. It was therefore evident at the first glance, that no man could be justified by a law that peremptorily demanded this absolute and sinless perfection, which no mere man ever yet rendered to it; but it was further evident, as God had declared another way of justification and eternal life: (Note, Hab. ii. 4. Rom. i. 17.) and the way of faith, by which alone the most righteous of our fallen race can live before God, is perfectly distinct from, yea, opposite to, that of the law, which never proposes life but upon the terms of perfect obedience. (Notes, Lev. xviii. 5. Matt. xix. 17—22. Mark xii. 28—34. Luke x. 25—29. Rom. x. 5—11.) Every one, therefore, who has not performed this condition, is under a curse; but Christ hath redeemed his people from that curse of the law, or bought them off by a price paid for them, having been willingly made a curse in their stead. For, as it was the purpose of God thus to deliver men from wrath by the ignominious and agonizing sufferings of his beloved Son upon the cross, and all the punishment which he then endured, so he declared that kind of punishment to be accursed, and an emblem of his most dreadful vengeance, when it was written, " Cursed is every one that hangeth " on a tree;" (Note, Deut. xxi. 23.) that so, when the holy and divine Saviour was suspended on the cross, it might appear that he endured the curse of the law in our stead. Thus the way was opened for the blessing of Abraham, even the righteousness of faith, and friendship with God, to be conferred, not only on the Jews, but on the Gentiles also, through Christ, and by faith in him: and that they too might receive the promised gifts of the Spirit by faith, to seal to them the truth of the Gospel, and his sanctifying grace, and their own free justification. (Note, Acts ii. 14—21.) It is evident that the apostle supposed the Gentiles to be under the curse of the law as well as the Jews, but in another form; else they would not have needed this redemption and justification. The just, &c. (11.) Or, " The just by faith shall live." This is the more exact translation;" and as " the righteous" ness of faith" does not secure men from temporal death, in any form or at any time, so deliverance from eternal condemnation, and eternal life in heaven, must be intended. Curse of, &c. (13.) As Christ died, not to deliver us from temporal death, but from " the wrath to " come," it is manifest that the curse of the law, whether the law of Moses, or any law which men are supposed to be under, is eternal damnation, not temporal or temporary punishment. Christ did not suffer eternal damnation; for, being God as well as man, his temporary sufferings constituted an infinite satisfaction to divine justice, and a display of the evil of sin, and the honour of the divine law. Many expositors, who contend against the imputation of Christ's righteousness to believers, in disputing against Socinians, argue for the vicarious sufferings of Christ in our stead. Now, what is this but imputation? He, though perfectly holy, paid the debt which we vile sinners had contracted. " It was exacted, and he be" came answerable. We, vile sinners, on believing, are " made the righteousness of God in him," and receive the inheritance which he merited. Thus there is a reciprocal imputation. But as the imputation of sin did not render the Saviour either criminal or polluted, but had its effect merely in his receiving the punishment which we deserved, so the imputation of his righteousness does not render us either free from criminality or pollution, but merely entitles us to the reward of his righteousness. We have still the same need of humiliation and repentance, of sanctification, and personal obedience, and holiness, without which we have no evidence that we are made the righteousness of God in him. ' I wonder that Jerome ' and Erasmus should labour and seek for I know not ' what figure of speech, to show that Christ was not ' called accursed. Truly in this is placed all our hope: ' in this the infinite love of God is manifested: in this ' is placed our salvation, that our God, properly and ' without any figure, poured out all his wrath on his own ' Son; caused him to be accursed, that he might receive ' us into favour. Finally, without any figure, Christ was ' made a curse for us, in such a manner, that unless he ' had been truly God, he must have remained under the ' curse for ever, from which for our sakes he emerged. ' For, indeed, if the obedience of the Son of God be figu' rative and imaginary, so must our hope of glory be.' (Beza.) The Spirit. (14.) The departure of the Spirit of life and holiness, when Adam sinned, left him spiritually dead, and proved him a condemned criminal; the gift of the Spirit of life and holiness in Christ Jesus, is the source of spiritual life, and the seal of his justification. The miraculous or extraordinary gifts of the Spirit cannot, therefore, be exclusively meant.

V. 15—18. The apostle proceeded to ground another argument upon the case of Abraham. Speaking of the high concerns of God's dealing with his creatures, after the manner of men's dealing with each other; he reminded the Galatians, that even a covenant between men, when fully ratified, could not be disannulled, or have any new conditions added to it, without the explicit consent of all parties. Now the formal ratification of the covenant with Abraham, and its express promises to him and his Seed, took place long before the Mosaic law; and could not therefore be altered or disannulled by it. Neither did the Lord include all the descendants of Abraham in these promises, as so many distinct kinds of seed: but they were limited to him, and his Seed in the singular number, which implied that Christ was principally meant, and others only as related to him. (Marg. Ref.) So that the unbelieving descendants of Jacob were no more interested in the most valuable promises, than the posterity of Ishmael and Esau: while all believers, though of gentile extraction, being one with Christ, were included in the Abrahamic covenant, without any concern in the Mosaic law or the Sinai-covenant. Now this covenant confirmed with Abraham, in respect of Christ and his salvation, the law, which was not given till four hundred and thirty years after the calling of Abraham, could not disannul, that the promise should be rendered of none effect, (Note, Ex. xii. 40, 41.) For if the inheritance of heaven, (which was typified by that of Canaan,) had depended on the law, and men's personal obedience to it; it could not have been secured to believers by the promise given to Abraham; and the new conditions added to his covenant would virtually have disannulled it.

V. 19—22. If then the promises were made to Abraham and his Seed, and all believers in him, without any dependence on the law; what purpose did the law answer, and why was it promulgated? To this objection the apostle answered, that it was added to the covenant with Abraham, and subserved the accomplishment of it in various particulars, previously to the coming of Christ; though it made no alteration as to the manner of a sinner's acceptance. The whole system served, "because of trans-"gressions," to restrain the nation of Israel from universal idolatry and wickedness, and to preserve the worship of God among them till the coming of Christ: the moral law was useful to convince men of sin, to show them their need of repentance, of mercy, and of a Saviour; the ceremonial law shadowed forth the way of acceptance and holiness, and believers were thus enabled to maintain communion with God, by faith in the promised Messiah. Thus it pleased God, that things should remain, till the coming of that Seed of Abraham, to whom especially the promises had respect; and the law was promulgated, and formed into a national covenant, at mount Sinai, by the ministration of angels, and by the intervention of Moses as a typical Mediator. (Notes, Ex. xix. xx. xxiv.) It was, however, well known, that a Mediator was not appointed to act merely in behalf of one party, in any covenant, but of two at least: yet only one party in the Abrahamic covenant was present when the law was given, even God himself. For the nation of Israel was not the other contracting party in that covenant; unbelievers among them had no share in the principal blessings of it; and all believers in every age and nation were concerned in it, by virtue of their union with the Seed to whom the promise was made. So that Moses might mediate another covenant between God and Israel: but he was not authorized to alter or disannul the Abrahamic covenant; which therefore continued in force with all believers, after the giving of the law, exactly as before. This does not mean, that Christ was not present, as JEHOVAH, and the great Agent in the giving of the law: but only that he acted in his legislative, and not in his mediatorial character, or as representing the whole body of believers. If this then were the case, it might further be inquired, Whether the law was contrary to the promises of God, and the accomplishment of them to those who lived under that dispensation? To this the apostle answered, "God forbid!" 'let that thought be rejected with 'abhorrence.' The Sinai covenant was distinct from the Abrahamic; the moral law, as the standard of duty from the Gospel; the foundation of a sinner's hope, and the shadows of the ceremonies from Christ the Substance; but they were not contrary to each other, when properly understood. Nay, the law in every sense subserved the promises, and the performance of them to believers: it was good in itself, and for the ends proposed by it; but it was never intended to give life to sinners. For if there had been such a law given as could have answered this end, verily righteousness, or justification unto life, would have been by the law, and the whole plan of redemption by Christ would have been superfluous. But whether the Mosaic dispensation, as unconnected with the Gospel, or the moral precepts and sanctions, or the ceremonies, or any other part of the Old Testament, was duly attended to, its uniform tenour concluded, or shut up, all men of every nation or character under sin, under the guilt of their actual transgressions, and the power of their evil propensities, as in a strong prison, from which no law could give them deliverance. This was intended to recommend the Gospel, that the promise of pardon, righteousness, liberty, grace, and eternal life, by faith in the promised Saviour, being proposed to men when shut up as condemned criminals in a prison, without hope or possibility of escape, might be freely performed to all who by faith acceded to the proposal; while all others must be left under the condemnation and the power of sin, without remedy.—(Notes, Rom. i. ii. iii.) All under sin. (22.) The original word is neuter: 'All men, and whatever can proceed 'from man, so that it is more emphatical than if it had 'been masculine.' (Beza.)

V. 23—25. Before the great Object and Author of faith was come, and the doctrine of faith fully declared, the nation of Israel, the visible Church, was kept under the legal dispensation; and not only were unbelievers shut up under the curse of the law as at other times, but even believers were held in a state of comparative darkness and bondage. Through the promises and ceremonies they received a measure of light and encouragement, and thus they looked forward to that brighter day which was predicted; while the nation at large was shut up by the institutions and sanctions of the law, and so restrained from total apostacy, till the coming of Christ and the full revelation of the doctrine of faith. So that the Church, considered as a complex body, was in a state of pupilage and minority under the old dispensation; and the law served as a pedagogue or tutor, to instruct it in the introductory lessons of religious knowledge by many hard tasks and burdensome restraints, imposed with much salutary severity. This was so ordered, that Christ and his salvation might be the more welcome, and that the very rigour of the law might bring men to him, that they might be justified by faith. But when the great Object and doctrine of faith were publicly introduced, the Church was no longer to continue under a school master; but was to be admitted to a nobler liberty, and instructed in a more open and enlarged manner. As therefore children are glad to be released from the confinement and discipline of a school, so believers should welcome the liberty and privileges of the Gospel; and it was peculiarly absurd for Christians to be attached to the state of confinement under which the ancient Church had been held, and the yoke of the legal dispensation. This admits of an obvious accommodation to the believer's experience, and the first use of the moral law in bringing men to Christ; but the above is the evident scope of the apostle's argument. 'God 'also fully pardoned the sins of the upright Jews, and 'freed them from the punishments of the other life; but 'not by virtue of the blood of bulls and goats, but by 'virtue of their faith in the Messiah, owned by them to 'be the Messiah, their Righteousness.' (Whitby.)

V. 26—29. Even the Gentile converts were made at once the children of God by faith in Christ, and admitted to the full privilege of that high relation, by an interest in his atonement and righteousness. For as many of them as had been baptized, according to Christ's appointment, and thus admitted into his Church, if indeed they were what this profession implied, had put on Christ as their robe of righteousness. It is generally supposed that the apostle alludes to the custom of baptized persons putting off their old garments, and putting on new, clean, or white raiment, after they had been baptized; but it is by no means certain that this custom prevailed at so early a period; at least the sacred writers do not mention it. Indeed, the connexion of the twenty-seventh verse with that which precedes, shows that the faith in Christ, which was publicly professed in baptism, and not the mere outward administration, whether the baptized person had faith or not, was especially intended. 'God now looking on them, there appears nothing but 'Christ; they are, as it were, covered all over with him, 'as a man is with the clothes that he hath put on; and 'hence in the next verse it is said, they are all one in

CHAP. IV.

The church had been under the law, as an heir under a guardian, 1—3. Christ came to redeem those that were under the law, and to give both Jews and Gentiles the adoption of sons, 4—7. The apostle shows how absurd the conduct of the Galatians was; in that, after having been delivered from idolatry by the gospel, they willingly subjected themselves to the bondage of the law: and he expresses his fears of them, 8—11. He tenderly expostulates with them, for becoming alienated from him, to whom they had expressed the most fervent love; ascribes this to the influence of false teachers, and shows the ardour of his soul in longing for their salvation, 12—20. He illustrates this subject of the two covenants, by showing, that the history of Sarah and Hagar was an allegorical representation of them, 21—31.

'Christ Jesus, as if there were but that one person.' (Locke.) The learned writer indeed connects this high privilege with the profession of the Gospel; but it cannot be connected with a hypocritical profession. 'The false 'apostles might urge, that circumcision was used even 'from Abraham; but the apostle answers, that baptism 'has succeeded to circumcision.' (Beza.) 'Baptism 'under the Gospel, as the rite of initiation, is as effectual 'for making us the sons of God, as circumcision was 'under the law.' (Macknight.) We may also add, 'and no more.' (Note, Rom. ii. 28, 29.) From the time, when any persons "believe in their hearts unto "righteousness, and with their mouths make confession "to salvation," all other distinctions vanish; they are all members of the mystical body of Christ, and entitled to all its blessings, without any need of the Mosaic law. So that if the Galatians did indeed belong to Christ, by faith and the participation of his Spirit, they were become the spiritual seed of Abraham, and heirs of all the blessings covenanted to him; and had therefore no need of being proselyted to the Jewish law, or concerned in the abrogated Sinai-covenant. The question, concerning the baptism of infants, is not at all affected by the apostle's language in this passage: for the same way of arguing, by which some have attempted to prove that they ought not to be baptized, because incapable of believing, would also prove them incapable of salvation, (Mark xvi. 16. Eph. ii. 7, 8;) and also that the male infants of Israel ought not to have been circumcised. That question must be determined by arguments of a more appropriate nature.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—5.

The faithful preaching of the Gospel so exhibits Christ crucified, as the great Object of the sinner's faith, hope, and admiring gratitude, and so shows the nature, glory, and preciousness of his sufferings, from love to our souls, that he is, as it were, evidently set forth before men's eyes, as dying upon the cross for their sins. But how small a portion of the preaching in Christendom answers this description, or tends thus to excite men's affections towards the gracious Redeemer, needs not be told. Alas! who hath infatuated and bewitched men's minds, that they should so generally turn away from this fundamental doctrine, to listen to metaphysical subtleties, moral harangues, superstitious observances and forms, or enthusiastical reveries? It is plain, that the god of this world, by various instruments, who mutually despise each other, hath "blinded men's eyes, lest the Gospel of the glory of "Christ should shine into them," and they should learn to trust in a crucified Saviour, "God manifested in the "flesh." But we must observe, with still greater grief and astonishment, the folly of numbers, who have often heard the Gospel most faithfully and pathetically preached, and yet have at length been fascinated, by plausible deceivers, to refuse obedience to the truth. We cannot indeed appeal to miracles and extraordinary gifts of the Holy Spirit; but we may boldly demand, Where are the fruits of the Spirit most evidently brought forth? among those who preach justification by the works of the law, or those who preach the doctrine of faith? They who have begun to fear God, to seek mercy, to pray, and to renounce sin, under the preaching of the Gospel, must be very foolish, if they think to make further proficiency by returning to legal dependencies, or resting on carnal and external observances. It is most grievous to see those who have gone through sharp convictions, and even endured persecutions for attending on the Gospel, afterwards turning aside, and giving cause to fear that they have suffered so many things in vain: and indeed any affliction endured, without profit derived from it, should be considered as a cause for sorrow and humiliation.

V. 6—14.

We should aim to be "followers of those who, through "faith and patience, inherit the promises," and have obtained a good report: and for this end, we should study the Object, nature, and effects of Abraham's faith. They who partake of his faith shall surely inherit his blessing; and if we can ascertain that this is our case, we may be sure of sharing all his privileges. But who can, in any other way, escape the curse of the holy law? Who hath continued in all things written in it, to do them? Who dares demand life on this ground? Let us learn to distinguish accurately in this matter: "The law is not of "faith:" every law of God, and every legal covenant, must be perfectly distinct from the covenant of promise through faith in Jesus Christ: and if we confound these things, we shall find a curse instead of a blessing. The redemption of all, who ever were or shall be saved, was paid by the great surety of the new covenant, when he was "made a curse for us, and bare our sins in his own "body on the tree:" but the sufferings of this holy One of God more loudly warn sinners to flee from the wrath to come, than all the terrors of Sinai, or the curses of the law itself; for how can it be expected, that God will spare any man to whom sin is imputed, seeing he spared not his own Son, when our sins were charged upon him? Yet doth Christ, at the same time, as from the cross, most freely beseech sinners to take refuge in him, and with accents of the tenderest love invites even the Gentiles to accept of the blessing of Abraham, and to seek for the promise of the Spirit by faith in him!

V. 15—22.

No subsequent transactions, or external alterations, can disannul or add to that covenant, which engages eternal life to every believer; that promise cannot be made of none effect. Yet let us not think that the law was given in vain; the legal covenant and the ceremonies have answered their end, and, being fulfilled in Christ, are no more in force; yet are they still replete with instruction to believers, though a better covenant is made with them, through that great Mediator, whom "all the angels of "God worship." But, as the law of Moses was never contrary to the promises of God to Abraham and his Seed, but served as a school-master, to bring the Church to Christ for justification by faith, so it would be most absurd to suppose that the holy, just, and good law of God, the universal standard of duty, is contrary to the Gospel of Christ, as it is in every way subservient to it, when properly understood and used. If a law was ever given to fallen man, which could give eternal life, this must be it, and then righteousness is by the law; but, instead of this, it brings in the whole world guilty before God, and shuts up every man under sin, without hope or remedy from any other quarter than the Gospel; while the excellency of its precept demonstrates the justice of the sinner's condemnation. Here Christ finds transgressors, and the promise of eternal life is freely given by him to all that believe.

V. 23—29.

Men in general, even under the dispensation of the Gospel, continue shut up as in a dungeon, in love with their chains, being blinded, intoxicated, and lulled asleep by Satan, through worldly pleasures, interests, and pursuits. But the awakened sinner discovers his dreadful condition, and the more he examines, or labours to escape, the fuller conviction he receives that he cannot effect his own deliverance; then he learns, that the mercy and grace of God form his only hope; and, though his measure of doctrinal knowledge may be scanty, he is "shut up to the "faith, that will shortly be revealed" to him. The precepts and sanction of the law urge him on to duty, and restrain him from sin, even while they discourage him and fill him with terrors; and thus, by a kind and beneficial severity, the law is made use of by the convincing Spirit, to show the sinner his need of Christ, and to bring him to rely on his merits, that he may be justified by faith. Then he ceases to be under the tuition of the law as a schoolmaster, and to be alarmed by its terrors, (except as he lives beneath his privileges;) yet the precept becomes, by the teaching of the Spirit of Christ, his guide in the delightful path of evangelical obedience, his beloved rule of duty, and his standard of daily self-examination; in this use of it he learns continually to depend more simply on the Saviour's merits, and it puts energy into his prayers, and endears the promises to his soul. Thus we become the children of God by faith in Christ, and, being baptized into him by the converting grace of the Holy Spirit, we put on Christ, and stand accepted in him; and all, who thus belong to him and are one with him, are the children of Abraham, and heirs according to the promise. But no outward forms or profession can ensure these blessings, for "if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, "he is none of his."

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1—3. The argument and illustration of the preceding chapter are here continued. The heir of a large estate, during his minority, is excluded from the possession of it, and kept in subjection to guardians and tutors, who lay restraints upon him, as if he was a servant; though in fact he is the proprietor of the whole inheritance: and this continues till the time appointed by his father, in his will or otherwise, for his coming of age, and being put in possession of the estate. Thus the Church was held in apparent bondage under the Mosaic law, till the coming of Christ, as being in its childhood, and under tuition. These observances are called, "the elements of this world;" they taught the simplest rudiments of religious knowledge, as the alphabet contains the first principles of science: and the burdensome external ceremonies of that dispensation were suited to the ideas of worldly men, and in many things similar to the rites of other nations, rather than adequate means of spiritual worship, or adapted to those who were matured in spiritual judgment and affections. The splendid temple, the priests in their sacred vestments, the multiplied sacrifices and religious festivals, and other things of the same kind, when their typical meaning and use were neglected, were greatly coincident with the gross apprehensions of carnal men concerning God and his worship. Thus unbelievers had always abused them; and even believers were held in comparative darkness and bondage, by so many external observances.

5 To [i] redeem them that were under the law, [k] that we might receive the adoption of sons.

6 And because ye are sons, [l] God hath sent forth [m] the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, [n] crying, Abba, Father.

7 Wherefore [o] thou art no more a servant, [p] but a son; and [q] if a son, then an [r] heir of God through Christ.

8 Howbeit, then [s] when ye knew not God, [t] ye did service unto them which by nature are no gods.

9 But now, after that [u] ye have known God, or rather [x] are known of God, [y] how turn ye * again to the weak and beggarly † elements, whereunto ye desire again to be in bondage?

V. 4—7. When the fulness of time was arrived for the coming of the Messiah, which God had chosen in his purpose and made known by prophecy, and which the state of the Jewish nation, and of mankind in general, showed to be peculiarly suitable for the introduction of a new and more enlarged dispensation, then God sent forth his own Son, One with him in the divine nature, to become manifest in the flesh, assuming human nature into personal union with the Deity, by his miraculous conception in the womb of the virgin, that he might be made, or born, (as some copies read it,) of a woman, and be emphatically her seed, (Gen. iii. 15,) by receiving his human flesh of her substance. ‘ He was therefore the ‘ Son of God, even, yea, properly, in respect of his ‘ Deity.’ (Beza.) Thus he was also made under the law, being born of a Jewess, and the reputed Son of a Jew, and circumcised; that so being under it as a covenant of works, he might, as the Surety of the Church, in every way answer its full demand. This was done voluntarily, without any previous obligation. As the Son of God, he was not bound to be subject to any law; as a perfectly holy man, he was not bound to submit to the ceremonial law, which in every thing implied man's sinfulness. But he was pleased for more than thirty years to tabernacle here on earth, in perfect obedience to the whole law; and at length to give himself as a spotless sacrifice of infinite value, to redeem sinners from the curse of the broken law, and to redeem the Church from the ceremonial law, which was a kind of bond given for future payment by the Surety, of the debt due to divine justice for the sins of those who had obtained forgiveness by faith in the promised Saviour. Thus, instead of the yoke of ceremonial obedience and that slavish spirit which in many cases it inspired, believers received and possessed the adoption of children, and had the liberty and privileges of adults, instead of the restraints and rigorous subjection of minors. And because this was the state of Gentile as well as Jewish converts, God had sent forth the Holy Spirit, as given through his Son, to quicken, seal, and comfort them, as his beloved children, enabling and encouraging them, with filial love and confidence, to call upon him as their Father, of whatever nation they were. Seeing, therefore, the apostle hoped that this was the case of the Galatians in general, though there might be exceptions, (for he addressed them individually, every person of this character, of whatever country or language, was no longer a servant, to worship and obey God from slavish fear or mercenary hope; but a child of God, and an heir of heaven through Christ, to walk with him in love, filial reverence, and confidence. (Note, Rom. viii. 15—17.)

V. 8—11. The preceding argument proved, that even Jewish converts were redeemed from the yoke of the ceremonial law, as well as from the curse of the legal covenant. How absurd then would it be for Gentiles to have recourse to that abrogated system! The Galatians had formerly been ignorant of the one living and true God, and had then performed religious service to mere creatures, or imaginary beings, which by nature were not gods: and external observances might accord very well to such objects of worship. But, having at length been brought to the knowledge of God, by their conversion to Christianity, or rather having been thus known and owned by him, through the spiritual gifts bestowed on them, how could they think of turning again to such carnal services as they had forsaken, as if desirous of being in bondage to them? The Jewish ceremonies were mere rudiments of religious knowledge suited to the childhood of the Church: they were, in themselves, weak and inefficacious, low and poor; and thus incapable of communicating spiritual riches to mankind: after the coming of the Messiah, they lost all their use and obligation; they became as worthless even as the superstitions of Paganism, and, when put in the place of Christ, they were equally inconsistent with true religion. In this sense only could the Galatians be said "to turn again to the weak and beggarly elements;" for they had not before been under the ceremonial law: but, when delivered from idolatry, they were about to substitute the abrogated Jewish ceremonial in the place of the heathen superstitions; and to bring themselves into bondage to Judaizing teachers and Pharisaical traditions, after having been emancipated from the Pagan priests. Their observation of Jewish sabbaths, new-moons, festivals, and sabbatical years, had the appearance of an apostacy to Judaism, so that the apostle was afraid that they would totally depart from the faith, and that his labours for their eternal salvation would be in vain. Beggarly, &c. (9.) ‘ Thus he calls these rites in themselves, and con‘sidered apart from Christ.’ (Beza.) ‘ St. Paul calls ‘ them "weak and beggarly elements," ‘ whereby it 'should seem, they were empty of all spiritual meaning. 'I answer, such they were become indeed, when Christ 'was once come; when the grace signified in them was 'brought out into the light, when the inwrapped pro-'mises were unfolded and revealed, they were then as 'empty shells, and like carcasses whose soul was gone. 'So long as a shell contains a kernel unseen, so long it is 'full; when it comes forth to outward view, then the 'shell is empty. Even so it is with the elements of the 'law.' (Mede.) The best illustration of the absurd conduct, which the apostle ascribes to the Galatians, may be found in the Church of Rome, in which the worship of saints and angels succeeded to that of the inferior deities; the superstitious, and often licentious, festivals, which were multiplied among them, to those that were used in Pagan Rome. In short, almost every part of the idolatrous worship of Pagan Rome has its counterpart in that of Antichristian Rome; as may be seen by any man, who will take the pains to compare many passages in Virgil, and other poets, with the rituals of the Church of Rome.

V. 12—16. 'The apostle tempers whatever he might 'seem to have said more sharply than usual, by an ad-'mirable, and therefore no doubt a divine, management; 'so declaring his good-will to the Galatians; that when 'they read it, unless they were wholly desperate, they 'could not but acknowledge his lenity with tears.' (Beza.) Being desirous of considering the Galatians as his brethren in Christ, he affectionately entreated them to be as he was, as cordial in love to him, as he was to them; or rather, of one mind with him respecting justification and the Mosaic law: for "he was as they were;" though he had been zealous for the law, (as they were become!) yet he now trusted only in Christ; and put no more confidence in the law, than if he had been a Gentile; and he entreated them in this to imitate him. He did not charge them with having at all injured him, or speak any thing out of resentment, though they had wronged themselves in departing from his doctrine. They remembered his first coming among them, when his personal infirmities seemed to unfit him for preaching the Gospel, or likely to render his ministry unacceptable: yet he was enabled to proceed, though greatly tried, and tempted to discouragement. They had not, however, despised him on that account, or rejected his testimony; but, seeing that his doctrine was confirmed by undeniable proofs, and feeling its energy on their consciences, they received him, though thus infirm and tempted, even as if he had been an angel sent from God, or as if Christ himself had come in person to preach to them. (Note, &c. 2 Cor. xii. 7—10.) Doubtless the apostle here spake of "his thorn in the flesh," which must therefore have been some perceivable infirmity, that exposed him to inward temptations and to the contempt of his enemies; and indeed it is absurd to explain this of his persecutions, which were no plausible reason why he should be despised, but the contrary. What was then the felicity of which they spake, as communicated by the hope and comforts of the Gospel? Or what must now have become of that blessedness, that they had recourse to the legal covenant, which could only enslave and condemn them? Their inward satisfaction in Christ had at that time so inspired them with love to his minister, that he could testify for their willingness even to have plucked out their own eyes, and to have given them to him, if this could possibly have removed his infirmities, or conduced to his benefit. And was he so soon become their enemy? the object of their aversion and resentment? If so, it must be because he had persisted in telling them the truth, both in respect of the way of salvation, and of their perilous deviation from it.

V. 17—20. The Judaizing teachers showed great attention to the Galatians, and expressed the most zealous affection for them; but this did not arise from proper principles, nor was it expressed in a proper manner. Yea, they would even exclude them from the liberty and salvation of Christ, in order to confirm them in a blind attachment to their doctrine. Some copies, (not manuscripts,) read, "they would exclude us:" they wanted to alienate them from the apostle, that they might possess an undivided authority over them from carnal motives. But, instead of showing such warm affection all at once towards these deceivers, it would be good for the Galatians to be constantly zealous in a good thing, even for the truth and cause of pure Christianity; and not only while the apostle continued among them, as had been the case with many of 21 ¶ Tell me, [y] ye that desire to be under the law, [z] do ye not hear [a] the law?

27 For it is written, [r] Rejoice thou [s] barren that bearest not; break forth and cry, thou that travailest not: for the [t] desolate hath many more children, than she which hath an husband.

28 Now [u] we, brethren, as Isaac was, are the children of promise.

29 But as then, [x] he that was born after the flesh, persecuted him that was born [y] after the Spirit, [z] even so it is now.

30 Nevertheless, [a] what saith the scripture? [b] Cast out the bond-woman and her son: for [c] the son of the bond-woman shall not be heir with the son of the free-woman.

them. Some render the clause, "It is good to be "zealously affected towards a good man," &c. (meaning himself,) but this is not in the apostle's manner, and scarcely reconcileable to the Greek idiom. He would, however, consider them as his dear children, though in a state of infantine imbecility; and as he had laboured and suffered in earnestly seeking their conversion from idolatry, so he might be said "a second time to travail in "birth" for them. He was as earnest for their recovery from their present delusion, as he had been for their conversion from idolatry: his heart was even filled with anguish from his anxiety about them; and he suffered pangs like those of a travailing woman, which seemed as if they must continue till "Christ was formed in them," in proof that they had put on Christ as their robe of righteousness; for their legal observances were no more like the genuine holiness and obedience of true believers, than their legal dependence resembled the faith of God's elect. He therefore longed to be with them, that he might witness this happy change, and that he might alter his words of reproof for those of encouragement and commendation, or change his voice as different circumstances and characters required, which could not so well be done in an epistle. For he stood in doubt of them, or hesitated as to what he should think of them; whether they had been truly converted or not, and was anxious to know what the event of their present delusions would be.

V. 21—31. As many of the Galatians absurdly desired to be under the law of Moses, from a mistaken interpretation of the Old Testament, so the apostle demanded whether they did not observe what was written in the law, or in the books of Moses; (Marg. Ref.) for the history of Abraham contained an apt emblem of the two covenants. (Notes, &c. Gen. xvi. xxi.) Ishmael was born of Hagar, in the ordinary course of nature, and in consequence of a carnal project; but Isaac was born of Sarah, a free-woman, the wife of Abraham, by the miraculous performance of God's promise, when she was naturally past child-bearing. These things were intended as an allegory of the Sinai-covenant, and of that made with Abraham in Christ for the benefit of all believers. That part of the nation of Israel, which were not interested in the covenant made with Abraham by faith, were indeed outwardly a part of Abraham's family and of the visible Church; but, like Ishmael, they were born in servitude, all their obedience was of a slavish nature, and their privileges external and carnal: nor could the legal covenant deliver them from this state: for Hagar, (whose name signifies a Rock in the Arabic,) the bond-woman, was the emblem of mount Sinai in the deserts of Arabia, which country was afterwards peopled by her descendants, being without the boundaries of the promised land. From that mountain the law was given, and there the legal covenant was ratified. It therefore corresponded to Jerusalem and its inhabitants, as the outward worshippers of God, in the ordinances performed at the temple; for as far as they continued under the legal covenant, especially when they had rejected Christ and the Gospel, they were mere slaves, and not the children of God. But the heavenly Jerusalem, the true church, as coming from above, espoused to Christ, and represented by Sarah, is in a state of freedom; and this church is the mother of all true believers, who are born of the Spirit. And that this church should mainly consist of Gentile converts, had long before been figuratively predicted. (Notes, Is. liv.) Believers, therefore, whether Jews or Gentiles, like Isaac, were the children of promise: they were not only brought into the church, as descended from Abraham, or proselyted to an external profession; but they were supernaturally made a part of the true seed of Abraham, in virtue of the promise made to him, that "in his Seed "should all the nations of the earth be blessed." But as Ishmael, a slave by birth, and in no wise entitled to the inheritance, had mocked and persecuted Isaac, who was miraculously born of Sarah, according to the promise, to be Abraham's heir; so the Jews, who continued voluntarily in bondage under the legal covenant, at that time persecuted the Christians, who were born of the Spirit as Abraham's seed, according to the meaning of the Holy Ghost, and to whom alone true liberty and the heavenly inheritance belonged. But as the Galatians might read in the Scripture, that God himself had commanded Hagar and Ishmael to be sent away from Abraham's family, that the son of the bond-woman might not share the inheritance with Isaac; even so the Jewish nation would soon be cast out of the Church, and all who continued under the legal covenant would be excluded from heaven. If then the exclusive privileges of all believers were such by the covenant of grace, what an absurdity was it for the Gentile converts to desire to be under the law, which could not deliver the unbelieving Jews from bondage and condemnation! We should not have discovered this allegory in the history of Sarah and Hagar, if the apostle had not shown it to us; and much sobriety and discretion should be used in thus applying Scriptural narrations; yet this transaction was so remarkable, the coincidence so exact, and the illustration so instructive, that we cannot doubt but it originally was intended by the Holy Spirit as an allegory and type of those things to which the inspired apostle referred it; and it should be observed, that it was intended as an illustration of the subject under consideration, rather than as a direct argument.

The apostle exhorts the Galatians to stand fast in their christian liberty; and shows that, by being circumcised, they would in fact renounce Christ, 1—6. He disclaims preaching circumcision himself, and condemns it in others, 7—12. He cautions them not to abuse their liberty, but by love to serve one another; for love is the fulfilling of the law, 13—15. Exhorting them "to walk in the Spirit," he shows the conflict between the flesh and the Spirit, 16—18. He enumerates the works of the flesh, and the fruits of the Spirit, 19—23. He shows that true christians have crucified the flesh; again calls on them to walk in the Spirit, and warns them against vain-glory and envy, 24—26.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

While we are thankful for deliverance from "the elements of this world," by the light, liberty, and privileges of the Gospel, we should cheerfully submit to the restraints and corrections of our heavenly Father, in this our state of education for perfect felicity; and patiently wait the time appointed by him for our admission to it; and we ought to delight in the easy yoke of our Redeemer, whose service is perfect freedom. For who can enough admire the condescending compassion of the Son of God, in "being born of a woman, and made under the "law," that, by obedience unto the death upon the cross, he might redeem us wretched rebels from every fatal curse, galling yoke, and slavish terror; that so we might receive the adoption of children, and the Spirit of adoption, emboldening us to worship God as our Father, to walk with him in holy communion, and to rejoice in the hope of his everlasting felicity! May we, by this filial temper and conduct, at all times evince our adoption; and may "the Holy Spirit thus witness with our spirit, that "we are the children and heirs of God!" Once we knew not God; and though outward circumstances kept most of us from gross idolatry, yet we idolized the world, and sought our happiness from it. If then we now so know God in Christ, as to reverence, love, trust in, and obey him, it is the effect of his knowledge of us as the objects of his choice, and owning us as ransomed by the blood of his Son. What then have we to do any more with worldly idols? What occasion for superstitions and human inventions, as if we desired to be still in bondage? Surely, all those things must be weak and beggarly elements which God hath no where required of us! And though Christians may "observe a day to the Lord," yet an evident attachment to such things may well induce a fear concerning men's spiritual state; and it should always be remembered, that if ministers lose their faithful labours, their hearers lose their precious souls. Idolatry consists in worshipping what by nature is no God: surely then, the worship of saints and angels is turning again to heathenism; and every scriptural example of worship rendered to Christ, demonstrates that he is, by nature, "God over all, blessed for "evermore."

V. 12—20.

Ministers ought, as much as possible, to waive their personal complaints against the people; and to show more fear lest they should injure themselves, than lest they should behave amiss to them. It behooves us, when we think ourselves unkindly treated, to recollect the instances in which we experienced the candour and affection of our hearers, and when they overlooked those infirmities which we feared would have occasioned the rejection of our message. We may also remind them, when they seem about to turn aside, of those tender and sweet seasons, when they welcomed the message delivered by such poor worms, as if an angel, or even Christ himself, had spoken to them; and when their hearts were so full of blessedness, that they scarcely knew how sufficiently to express their gratitude to the instruments of their hopes and consolations. Contrasting these happy seasons with that coldness and disaffection which sometimes follow, without any apparent reason, we may with efficacy inquire, What is become of their blessedness? And whether we be looked on as enemies, because we tell them the truth? Alas! this is often the case, not only with mere professors, but even with misguided believers, when for a time they are seduced by those who zealously affect them, but not well; who would alienate them from their faithful pastors, to attach them to themselves; or who would even hazard their souls to promote their own credit, or that of their sect. At such times their most affectionate warnings and Scriptural arguments often give offence, and increase alienation. This is a most trying situation to the faithful minister. He cannot cease to feel for, and long after, his deluded children. Though he could bear to lose their affections, he cannot be willing that they should lose their souls: he must remind them, that their zealous affections should be towards more substantial good, than new notions and new teachers, as in the sight of God, and not merely in the presence of their ministers. Thus many know experimentally the apostle's meaning, when he said "that he travailed in birth again," of his spiritual children, till "Christ was formed in them;" as the anguish on account of those, who they had hoped were converted, is greater than their earnestness for their conversion; and their prayers and endeavours are more fervent, as fearing "lest their last state should be worse "than the first." Nothing is so sure a proof of a sinner's justification, as "Christ formed in him," by the renewal of the Holy Spirit: nor can this be hoped for, while men depend on the law for acceptance with God. The faithful minister desires to change his voice of reproof for that of commendation; and not only to instruct, but to speak confidently of those concerning whom he stands in doubt, and who therefore certainly ought to stand in doubt of themselves.

V. 21—31.

They who desire to be under the law should hear what the law says to them; and this would in every case teach them to flee from it to the grace of the Gospel. For not only do allegories and types instruct us, but the plainest language imaginable declares the two covenants, that from Sinai and that of Christ, to be perfectly distinct, and even of opposite tendency to those who now are under them. They who are born of the flesh, whether of Jewish or Christian parents, and who have only a legal dependence on circumcision, baptism, or any personal obedience whatsoever, or even on creeds, or sects, or national churches, however excellent, are under the covenant of works, mere Ishmaelites, bond-slaves, citizens of the earthly Jerusalem, and under condemnation. But they who "are born of the Spirit," and so believe in Christ, trusting only in his merits and grace, are the children of the promise, and of the heavenly Jerusalem; they possess true liberty, and are the heirs of everlasting felicity. Millions have already been thus born of God in the Gentile world, which once lay desolate; and we should pray that such places, as still continue barren, may speedily produce more converts than have yet been made in the most flourishing churches. If indeed we are the children of promise, and heirs of the inheritance, we need not wonder that carnal Ishmaels mock and persecute us: so it hath been, and so it will be. But let us rest our souls on the Scripture, and, by an evangelical hope and a cheerful obedience, let us show that we are the children of God; that we walk at liberty; and that our conversation and treasure are indeed in heaven.

NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 1—6. As Christ had called the Galatians, by his Gospel, to partake of full liberty from condemnation and from the ceremonial law, as well as from sin and Satan; so the apostle exhorted them to stand fast in that liberty, whatever efforts were used to deprive them of it; and not to suffer the judaizing teachers to entangle them in a yoke of bondage under the ceremonial law, which would reduce them again into as abject a slavery as that of their Gentile state. For he, Paul, though single, and opposed to many confident teachers who maintained the contrary, most decidedly and solemnly assured them, that if they submitted to circumcision, as necessary to justification, they would derive no benefit from Christ and his covenant, or from his righteousness, atonement and mediation; and he again testified to every individual among them, who should be circumcised from such motives, that he became a debtor to keep the whole law of God, and liable to condemnation for every failure in his obedience to it. Perhaps some taught them, that the most burdensome parts of the law were not obligatory on proselytes who lived at a distance from Jerusalem. And certainly Christ would not benefit that man, who brought himself under this obligation, by seeking to be justified on account of his own obedience to the law; as that attempt was in fact a renunciation of the doctrine of grace, a forfeiture of every hope of benefit from the mercy and free favour of God, and a kind of voluntary divorcing himself from Christ. For circumcision, in such circumstances, would be a deliberate renunciation of the covenant of Christ for that of the law: whereas all true Christians, whether Jews or Gentiles, being taught by the Holy Spirit, waited for eternal life, the proper reward of righteousness, and the object of their hope, as the gift of God by faith in Christ; and not for the sake of their own works in any degree. They not only deemed themselves pardoned and justified by faith in Christ, in respect of the past and present, but they had the same expectation for the future, and waited for the day of judgment, expecting to be accounted righteous only by faith in Christ, and thus entitled to the heavenly inheritance. For, according to the new covenant, and in respect of those who were members of the Christian church, neither circumcision nor uncircumcision were of any avail: the Jewish convert might observe the legal ceremonies, or he might assert his liberty from them; the Gentile might utterly disregard them; or from motives of expediency he might be circumcised, as Timothy had been, and pay some attention to them, provided he did not count them obligatory on his conscience, or place any dependence on them. But these things were of no avail in Christ Jesus. True faith alone received the Saviour, and interested the believer in his whole salvation; and this living and justifying faith was distinguished from a dead faith, by being an operative active principle; and especially as it always showed its energy in the heart, by love to Christ, his cause, and his people; by love to God and to man for his sake; and this never failed to produce its correspondent effect on a person's conduct. By this view of the subject, a simple dependence on the righteousness and atonement of Christ, and an evangelical obedience to his commandments, are at once secured; and the fruits of that love, by which faith worketh, will be adduced at the day of judgment, as evidences to prove believers entitled to the heavenly inheritance. (Matt. xxv. 31—46.) After what the apostle had before said, (2—4.) this conclusion fully proves that he did not oppose the observance of the ceremonial law as evil in itself, but as their legal dependence on it was wholly incompatible with the method of justification revealed in the Gospel. 'It is to be noted, that circum-'cision is here to be considered, partly from the cir-'cumstances of the times, (when it had ceased to be "the seal of the righteousness of faith," 'as by baptism 'it was abolished,) and partly from the sentiments of 'these adversaries, who were desirous to connect it with 'Christ, as if some part of salvation resided in it.' (Beza.)

V. 7—12. When the Gospel had first been received by the Galatians, they seemed in a very promising manner to run the race set before them; professing, and apparently exercising, that "faith which worketh by love," and obeying Christ from evangelical principles. But they were now evidently hindered and turned aside from this obedience of faith and love to ceremonial observances and legal principles. But who were they that had thus driven them back from the way of Christ into these new and unauthorized paths? (or, come across them in the course, and turned them out of it.) This persuasion of the necessity of circumcision certainly did not come from the apostle, who had called them to the grace of Christ; nor was it from the Holy Spirit, the Agent in the sinner's conversion. In fact, a few Judaizers had crept in among them, who, being infected with pride, bigotry, and enmity to the pure Gospel of Christ, had leavened them also with a similar spirit: its baleful influence was rapidly diffusing itself through all their churches, and would have most fatal effects, unless counteracted. Yet, (notwithstanding his fears concerning them,) reflecting on the manner in which they had received his doctrine, and trusting in the Lord Jesus, he had a confidence in them that they would recover from the temporary fascination, and become entirely of his judgment on the subject. Then the ringleader of the defection, or any other person who had perverted them, (of whatever importance he had seemed to be,) would be justly censured by them, and bear that condemnation from them which he deserved; as assuredly he would from God, unless he were brought to repentance. Indeed, it had been craftily and maliciously insinuated that the apostle himself, after his journey to Jerusalem, and his conference with the other apostles, on some occasions preached the necessity of circumcision, when it tended to increase his influence; (and for this his candid allowance to men's prejudices, when it could be safely done, and the circumcision of Timothy, might give the handle:) but if this had been his practice, why did he every where meet with such furious persecution from the Jews? For in that case, the offence of the cross of Christ would have in a great measure ceased. Had he proselyted the Gentiles to the Mosaic law, and taught justification by it, the Jews would have connived at his regard to Jesus of Nazareth, being gratified in their self-preference, and in the increasing number of those who observed the law. But his preaching Christ as the only Salvation of sinners, his disregard to the ritual law, his doctrine of justification, which left all unbelievers under condemnation without distinction, and his success among the Gentiles every where, exasperated the Jews against him. As then this insinuation was notoriously false, so he ardently wished that the persons who thus troubled them, and employed such manifest deceits for that purpose, were cut off by excommunication from their society, and so kept from doing them any further mischief. (Marg. Ref.) But why did he not command the Galatians to excommunicate them, as he had required the Corinthians to deliver the incestuous person to Satan, &c.? It is probable, because the infection had spread so wide in the churches of Galatia, and so very many were concerned in some degree, that there was little prospect, except by the intervention of miracles, that such a command would be obeyed. The apostle therefore pointed out to them their duty, and waited for a more favourable opportunity of exercising the needful discipline.

V. 13—15. The Galatians had been called unto liberty, and ought not to endure those who wanted to bring them into bondage: only let them be careful not to run into licentiousness, or to take occasion from their liberty to indulge the inclinations of corrupt nature. "Faith working by love" would indeed, as far as it had influence, lead them to serve and worship God as his children: and love to their brethren and to all men, for Christ's sake and after his example, ought to make them willing servants to each other, and induce them to give up their own inclinations and indulgence, to promote their welfare, as far as in their power, without doing any one harm in his person, connexions, property, reputation, or peace of mind. For the whole moral law contained no more, in all its requirements, than was implied in that "love" by which faith worked: especially the whole of men's duty to one another was summed up in the single precept of "loving their "neighbours as themselves," (Notes, Lev. xix. 18. Rom. xiii. 8—10.) and this still continued to be their rule of duty, though they were delivered from the law as a covenant. But if, on the contrary, they indulged selfishness, pride, and anger, by dividing into parties and quarrelling with each other, as if they would bite and devour one another, they might expect to be left by the God of peace and love to be the instruments of each other's present misery or future destruction.

V. 16—18. To prevent the ruinous consequences of contentions to themselves, and to the churches among them, the apostle called on them "to walk in," or by "the Spirit," according to his holy guidance, in dependence on his influences, and with constant prayer for them: this would effectually prevent them from fulfilling the lusts or desires of the flesh, or that evil nature with which they were born. 'According to his 'manner, the apostle calls that part of a man "the spirit," 'which is newly quickened by the Holy Spirit, which is 'dead unto sin and alive unto God; and, "the flesh," 'whatever in man is not renewed by grace, through 'Christ, as apprehended by faith. He here justly adds, 'that in the same regenerate man is both flesh, and spirit; 'the conflict between which is copiously shown in the 'seventh chapter of Romans.' (Beza.) For the flesh, the old man, lusteth in direct opposition to the desires of the new nature, in the regenerate, as well as to the dictates of the Holy Spirit: and the spirit, in both senses, opposeth the corrupt desires of the flesh, by holy affections and inclinations. These are therefore directly opposite to each other: so that believers "do not the things which "they would," (according to the most literal meaning of the words.) They are not so holy as they long to be; nor yet, though at liberty from the covenant of works, do they indulge those corrupt inclinations, which still rise up in their hearts, and cause them much trouble and uneasiness. Thus they are engaged in a perpetual conflict; in which they earnestly desire that grace may obtain a complete and speedy victory. And they, who thus give themselves up to be led by the Holy Spirit, are not under the law, nor exposed to its awful curse for every failure in their obedience: while their hatred of sin, and desires after holiness, according to the perfect rule of God's commandments, is the evidence that they are interested in the salvation of the Gospel. (Notes, Rom. vii. 7—25. viii. 1—17. Marg. Ref.) The apostle, in the Scriptures referred to, says, "As many as are led by the Spirit of "God, they are the sons of God." Here he says, "If "ye be led by the Spirit, ye are not under the law." Hence it follows, that they who are not under the law are the sons of God. 'Ye will not gratify the lusts of 'your animal nature; particularly ye will not gratify 'the sinful passions of envy, malice, anger, revenge.' (Macknight.) Do these belong to the animal nature? Is the devil then an animal? In fact all sin has its source and seat in the soul, and the body, even in gross sensual indulgences, is only the instrument of unrighteousness to sin. (Marg. Ref.) So strangely do many learned men mistake and misinterpret the declarations of Scripture on this subject!

V. 19—21. The difference between the flesh and the Spirit might be known by their contrary effects. The works of the flesh must be manifest to every one, who considered the conduct of unconverted men, and the state of the world in general. Several of the sins here specified as "the works of the flesh," have no connexion with the bodily appetites: which proves, that we are not to understand, by "flesh and spirit," the animal part of man, as distinguished from the intellectual; but the whole of our fallen nature, as opposed to the new nature communicated by regeneration, and the gracious influence of the Holy Spirit acting upon it. It is not requisite to consider every particular in this catalogue: a few may require observation. Idolatry is "a work of the flesh;" as it springs from man's carnal enmity to the holy character, worship, and service of God; in the stead of whom he deifies imaginary beings, more congenial to himself, and worships them in a manner more suited to his pride and lusts.—Witchcraft, (implying all kinds of sorcery, charms, divinations, incantations, fortune-telling, and attempted, real, or pretended, intercourse with evil spirits,) is a work of the flesh, as it results from man's carnal dislike of submission to God, and dependence on him, and a desire of seeking help and information from other quarters: by both these, men virtually worship the devil. Emulations, or "zeals," seem in this connexion to signify that ambition of pre-eminence and thirst for glory, which excite men to vie with one another, and eagerly to aspire after distinction, according to the nature of their objects and pursuits. Poets, orators, historians, philosophers, moralists, and all men who do not attend to the Bible, deemed this the noblest principle of human activity; yet it springs from unmingled pride and selfishness, and is nearly allied to envy. When the object of emulation is evil, its effects are dreadful; when the object is good, the glory of man is sacrilegiously substituted in the place of the glory of God, and this thirst for human applause has caused more horrible violations of the law of love, and done more to desolate the earth, than even the grossest sensuality ever did. Heresies are called works of the flesh; pride, ambition, avarice, or other carnal affections, induce men to pervert the truth of God's words, and, espousing some pernicious error, to seek distinction by propagating it.—Hence arise contentions, separations, and the most fatal effects to individuals and to the Church. These were therefore joined by the apostle with adulteries, unnatural, and worse than beastly lusts; drunkenness, envy, revellings, seditions, and even murders, as equally the result of a carnal heart, and marks of unregeneracy. Many more he might have mentioned; but these and such like would, without repentance and its fruits, certainly exclude men from heaven, as the apostle had formerly declared to them, and now again forewarned them. The word translated witchcrafts, is by some rendered poisonings, as if the apostle in this compendium would pause to distinguish one kind of murder from another, when the difference did not at all alter the nature or degree of the crime. "Witchcrafts," had the name used in the original, from the magical compositions of certain ingredients, which attended these diabolical practices. Revellings were such feasts as were accompanied with music and dancing, and whatever could promote hiliarity. The Greeks and Romans had an imaginary god, called Comus, (from the Greek word here used,) who was supposed to preside over them, and was in that character worshipped by hymns, oblations, and libations.

V. 22—26. The holy dispositions and affections, and the conduct resulting from them, are not so much the works of the believer, as "the fruit of the Spirit," dwelling in the new nature and working by it, which he hath produced by regeneration. Love of God and man, of the Saviour, his people, and all men for his sake, and according to his command and example; a joyful frame of mind in the salvation and service of the Lord; a peaceful conscience, and a submissive will, leading to a peaceful conduct towards man; a disposition to bear injuries and affronts, without seeking revenge, or expressing resentment; a mild, unassuming, inoffensive deportment, united with beneficence and philanthropy; truth, sincerity, fidelity and integrity to man, springing from faith in God and faithfulness to him; a humble, teachable, unambitious temper and demeanour, and an evident moderation about earthly objects, and in respect of every animal indulgence: these, and such like, are "the fruits of the Spirit;" and against them there is no law, for they are exactly what the moral law requires. (Notes, 1 Cor. xiii.) So that obedience to the law as a rule, and as written in the heart by the Holy Spirit, with delight and satisfaction, and earnest desires after more exact conformity to it, is the apostolical evidence of deliverance from the law as a covenant of works; and they who really belong to Christ, as justified believers, have actually crucified the flesh, with all its corrupt affections and rebellious inclinations. The carnal nature, the old man, is dethroned, condemned, hated, opposed, weakened, and wounded: his death is determined, though the execution be lingering and only

CHAP. VI.

The apostle exhorts the Galatians to restore the fallen with meekness, and to bear each other's burdens, according to the command of Christ, 1, 2; to beware of proud self-deception, 3—5; to provide for their pastors, and to persevere without wearying in every good work; being assured that every one will reap as he has sowed, 6—10. He shows the carnal motives and glorying of the Judaizing teachers, 11—13; and determines to glory in the cross of Christ alone, as crucified to the world, and the world to him, 14. Nothing in Christ avails, but a new creation, 15. He prays for peace on all true Israelites; desires that none of them would further trouble him, who, as an old soldier, bore the scars of his warfare; and he commends them to the grace of Christ, 16—18.

to be effected by a continued course of self-denial; and though he still struggles for life, liberty, and even victory; which perpetuates the believer's conflict, and prevents his complete holiness. But, says the apostle, if we live in, or by, the Spirit, as regenerate persons, "let us also "walk in the Spirit," and order our daily conversation according to his holy influence, and in dependence on his guidance; especially in mortifying the carnal desires of vain glory and human applause, and refraining from whatever may tend to exasperate the minds of other men, or manifest envy of their gifts, reputation, or prosperity. The body, as meaning the animal nature, must be "kept under "and brought into subjection," by proper discipline, as a child; but the flesh must be crucified, as an enemy and malefactor, which is doomed to inevitable destruction. (Note, 1 Cor. ix. 24—27.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12.

While so many are struggling for personal and political liberty, or disputing about it, as the greatest of earthly blessings, let us aspire after, and stand fast in, the liberty which Christ bestows: that, walking before God with the humble and obedient confidence of children, we may steadfastly reject every yoke of bondage, with which Satan or his ministers may attempt to entangle us. Especially we should regard the apostle's warnings to keep clear of all dependence on our own works for justification, as in that case "Christ will profit us nothing." It is to be feared, that numbers impose on themselves in this matter: they imagine that the merits of Christ will make up for their deficiencies, while their real dependence is placed on their own morality, devotions, or superstitions. But the divine Saviour will teach us to give him the whole honour of our justification, or he will leave us wholly to stand or fall by our own righteousness; and every man, who trusts to his own works, "becomes a debtor to do the whole "law:" "Christ becomes of none effect to him;" he virtually renounces the covenant of grace, and must expect to be dealt with according to the rigour of the covenant of works. May we then keep at a distance from this fatal rock, and be of that number, who "through the "Spirit wait for the righteousness of hope by faith!" For the danger of old did not lie in circumcision, as that and uncircumcision were alike immaterial in themselves, even as many external forms and observances now are: but faith working by love forms the essence of the religion of Christ. Without this all else is worthless; and, compared with it, other things are of small value. Yet many, who seemed to run well in this evangelical race, have been hindered from obeying the truth by those who perplexed them with refined notions, or laboured to proselyte them to some new sect or form: so that, instead of "the work "of faith, and labour of love, and patience of hope," they have turned aside to vain jangling, and zeal for trifling distinctions and the shibboleths of a party. This persuasion, that religion consists in such things, does by no means accord with the doctrine of the apostles, nor is it from the converting grace of the Spirit. Yet, when a little of this leaven gets into hopeful congregations, it is apt to diffuse itself through the whole lump. Its first beginnings should therefore be strenuously opposed; and they who would thus unsettle and pervert others, should be censured by their brethren, or even cut off from their communion: and certainly they who persist in disturbing and dividing the Church of Christ, must at last bear their judgment, whosoever they be.

V. 13—18.

It becomes us most steadfastly to maintain the pure Gospel of a crucified Saviour, whatever offence may be taken, or persecution endured, by means of it; but we should be equally watchful against those who make their "liberty an occasion for the flesh," and of indulging their selfish passions. By love, we should become the willing servants of one another and of all men; and in loving our neighbours as ourselves, according to the requirement of the holy commandment, we shall most effectually promote our own comfort, and the happiness of families, churches, and communities. But a house divided against itself cannot stand; and when professed Christians, instead of the gentleness of lambs and doves, become like savage beasts of prey, in biting and devouring one another, we need not wonder, that they are consumed one of another. Alas! how hath Satan prevailed in this way against the Church of Christ! What cruel persecutions and fierce controversies have arisen among Christians, so called! How many hopeful prospects have thus been clouded, and flourishing churches ruined! So that the nominal kingdom of the Prince of peace has become a scene of contention and discord! But all this would have been prevented, if men had "walked in the Spirit;" for they would not then have thus fulfilled the lusts of the flesh. The most eminent Christians indeed do not attain to all that they desire and aim at; yet they who are led by the Spirit, habitually oppose and mortify those sinful workings, which they cannot wholly extirpate.

V. 19—26.

It should always be kept in mind, that "hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, strife, seditions, heresies, "and envyings," are as much the works of the flesh, as adulteries, fornications, murders, drunkenness, revellings, or any sensual excess; and that they will as certainly exclude men from heaven, whatever profession of religion they make; nay, even when religion, in its purest form, is the pretence, subject, or occasion, of their malignant passions. But though the apostle hath repeatedly and plainly forewarned us, that they who do such things as are here mentioned, or others of a similar nature, shall not inherit the kingdom of God, yet what numbers of professed Christians live habitually in the grossest of them; and notwithstanding their adultery, fornication, shameful uncleanness, or secret lasciviousness, still hope for heaven, in neglect of evangelical repentance and faith! Nor can the most idolatrous covetousness, the most exorbitant pride, ambition, and emulation, the most notorious malice, wrath, hatred, envy, or even the murders committed in revengeful duels, deprive them of their presumptuous confidence. For "he that believeth not, hath made God "a liar." Nay, some even attempt to revive the worship of Satan by various divinations and prognostications, who would nevertheless be offended to be denied the name of Christians! Many also, who are zealous for the apostle's doctrine of justification, and suppose themselves not to be under the law, are so far from being led by the Spirit, that they are evidently and habitually fulfilling the lusts of the flesh; though the feeble remonstrances of a conscience, not totally callous, deceives them into an imagination that they are engaged in the conflict of the flesh and spirit! But let us never forget, that they who are not under the law for condemnation, are led by the Spirit into the love of its precepts, and an earnest desire to obey them. If we bring forth the fruits of the Spirit, as here described, in our habitual temper and conduct, we can have no objection to the daily examination of ourselves by that perfect standard of sin and holiness, that our love may be exercised in knowledge, and in all judgment: for against such things there is no law. They who "are "Christ's," (and all others, however distinguished, belong to Satan's kingdom,) "have crucified the flesh, with "its affections and lusts." Yet the imperfection of our attainments leaves room both for personal humiliation and mutual exhortations. If then we live in the Spirit, let us also walk in the Spirit; watching against spiritual pride and vain-glory; not provoking or envying one another, but following after love, and seeking to bring forth more abundantly those good "fruits which are, through "Jesus Christ, to the praise and glory of God."

NOTES.

CHAP. VI. V. 1—5. The apostle, having concluded the argumentative part of the epistle, added some particular admonitions before he closed it. If any brother had been, or should be, surprised into the commission of sin, through unwatchfulness and temptation, and contrary to the habitual tenour of his conduct, the more spiritual of them, who were most matured in judgment and experience, ought to bestow pains to bring him to repentance, and to give him proper counsel and encouragement, in a meek and compassionate spirit, that he might be restored, like a dislocated limb to its place; and not to treat him with harsh rebukes or disdainful neglect. For each of them severally ought to consider himself, and his own weakness and frailty, as he too might be tempted and overcome, and then he would need that meekness and sympathy, which he had refused to his offending brother. Thus they ought not only to bear with one another's infirmities, but, as fellow-travellers, to carry each other's burdens; while the stronger brother denied himself, in order to support, comfort, and assist the weak, the tempted, and afflicted, that so they might fulfil the commandment which Christ repeatedly gave his disciples, "to love one another;" and which indeed was the substance of his law, for their conduct towards their brethren. But if, on the contrary, any of them thought himself more wise, strong, or eminent, than the rest, on account of his gifts or reputation, and so trusted in himself and despised others, when in fact he was nothing in the school of Christ, having not learned the first lesson of his religion, he was under a sad delusion, his heart imposed on him, and in fact he was his own deceiver. To prevent this fatal mistake, it behooved every individual to prove his own work by the touch-stone of the sacred oracles, that he might discover whether his habitual conduct, and the motives of it, accorded to the principles, experience, and character of the true believer; that so, instead of arrogantly condemning others, or glorying in others, and their attachment to him, or opinion of him, he might find cause of rejoicing and humble glorying in himself, and in the attestation of the sanctifying Spirit to his faith in Christ, 6 Let [p] him that is taught in the word, communicate unto him that teacheth, in all good things.

7 Be [q] not deceived; [r] God is not mocked: [s] for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap.

8 For he that [t] soweth to his flesh shall of the flesh [u] reap corruption; but he that [x] soweth to the Spirit, shall [y] of the Spirit reap life everlasting.

9 And let [z] us not be weary in [a] well doing: [b] for in due season we shall reap, [c] if we faint not.

10 As we have therefore [d] opportunity, let us [e] do good unto all men, [f] especially unto them who are of the household of faith.

For every man must at last stand or fall, not according to the sect to which he belonged, or the judgment of men respecting him, but according to his real character in the sight of God. So that if any were deluded into fatal errors by false teachers, every one must bear the burden of his own guilt; nor would the condemnation of the deceiver exculpate him, who allowed himself to be deceived by him. (Marg. Ref.) The word rendered spiritual, when applied to persons, seems to denote the spirituality, or heavenly mind and judgment, of those who are thus distinguished. But all rulers, teachers, and workers of miracles, were not spiritual, spiritually minded, "led "by the Spirit," and filled with "the fruits of the "Spirit;" and many private Christians were. The duty of restoring the fallen might belong to the teachers and rulers primarily, but not exclusively. It can hardly be doubted, but that there were pastors and teachers in the churches of Galatia, yet they are scarcely mentioned in this epistle; perhaps, because they generally concurred with those who preached circumcision. Some indeed suppose, that the persons endued with spiritual gifts superintended the churches for some time, without any regular appointment, and that there were no other bishops or elders in Galatia at this time; but this by no means agrees with the history, which mentions the ordaining of elders by the apostles in every city, either personally, if they had leisure, or by apostolical men, or evangelists, (as Timothy, Titus, &c.) if compelled previously to leave the new converts. It is, however, probable, that these elders, and the deacons also, were generally chosen from among those who had been endued with miraculous powers, by the laying on of the hands of the apostles.

V. 6—10. The Lord had appointed the office of the ministry, for the conversion of sinners and the edification of believers; and accordingly the apostle exhorted the Galatians to contribute to the comfortable maintenance of their pastors, who instructed them from the word of God, communicating to them a proportion of their temporal good things, according to their ability. In this, and all such matters, they must be careful not to be deceived by their own hearts, by Satan, or by false teachers; for however they might excuse themselves, or impose upon men, and then deride their simplicity and credulity, God was not to be thus deceived, or mocked with false pretences; and it was most certain, that every man would at length reap a harvest correspondent to what he sowed. He that sowed to the flesh, by continuing to fulfil its lusts, and to indulge his selfish and sensual desires, under the profession of the Gospel, would only reap the corruptible things of this world; his body, which he indulged and pampered, would soon turn to corruption in the grave, and at length he himself would perish, as unregenerate, and having no inheritance in heaven. But the man who sowed to the Spirit, and, under the influences of the Holy Spirit, exercised daily repentance, faith in Christ, love to him and his brethren, and other Christian graces, would not only here reap the earnest and first fruits of inward consolations, but at length inherit everlasting life, as trained up for it by the sanctification of the Holy Spirit, and as receiving for Christ's sake a proportionable gracious recompense of all his disinterested and faithful services. Let then none of them grow weary of doing well, in dependence on Christ and for the honour of his Gospel, whatever conflicts, disappointments, persecutions, or temptations, they met with; for in due season, in the time of harvest, they would surely reap an abundant increase of all their labours, self-denial, and expense, if they showed the sincerity of their faith and love by continuing to the end without fainting in the work of the Lord. While therefore their lives were continued, and opportunities afforded, they ought to make it their great business, and deem it their chief pleasure, honour, and advantage, to be doing good, according to their ability, to men of every description, but especially to those who were their brethren in the family of God, by faith in Christ, or all professed Christians, who showed their sincerity in professing the Gospel by their temper and conduct. For surely those learned men, who would substitute the word profession, instead of faith in Christ, do not mean to include those who evidently make a hypocritical profession;

Jesus Christ, by [*] whom [q] the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world.

15 For [r] in Christ Jesus [s] neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision, [t] but a new creature.

16 And as many as [u] walk according to this rule, [x] peace be on them, and mercy, and upon [y] the Israel of God.

17 From henceforth [z] let no man trouble me: for [a] I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus.

V. 11—16. The words here rendered "how large a "letter," are supposed by many persons to signify with what kind of letters, referring to the apostle's want of skill in writing the Greek language. He had, however, bestowed great pains to pen this epistle with his own hand, either because he had not an amanuensis with him, or, rather, because he did not choose to employ one, but wrote the whole himself, that he might convince the Galatians of his love to them, and anxiety about them. There were professed teachers of Christianity indeed, who wanted to make a fair show in the flesh, or in respect of external matters, by forming a coalition between the Jewish religion and that of Jesus. These were so very earnest in urging the Gentiles to be circumcised, that they might be said even to compel them, as they would take no denial, and exhausted all their eloquence and ingenuity to overcome their reluctance. But, notwithstanding their attachment to the ritual law, they would not have been so earnest in this matter, if they could otherwise have possessed their influence in the Christian Church, without exposing themselves to persecution for professing faith in Christ and his cross. For, not only did the Jews hate and persecute those who preached the Gospel to the Gentiles, without regarding the Mosaic law, but the heathen rulers also, who tolerated the Jews and such Christians as observed the law, were inveterate against the Gentile Christians, and deemed them an upstart sect, dangerous to the civil government. This crafty and selfish aim of the judaizing teachers, of advancing themselves to consideration in the Christian Church, without exposing themselves to persecution, induced them to be very zealous in proselyting the Gentiles to the Mosaic law, but they were not equally strict in their own observance of it; not only were they negligent of the moral precepts, but probably on one pretence or other, they dispensed with themselves and one another, in respect to the more burdensome and expensive of the ceremonial institutions, many of which could not be observed in countries distant from Jerusalem. So that it was evident they only desired the Gentiles to be circumcised, that they might glory in having induced such numbers to bear in their flesh this mark of their being proselyted. This both placed them at the head of a Christian sect, and also tended to procure them favour and reputation with the Jewish rulers and others. But the apostle added, with a noble disdain of such base motives, "God forbid that I should glory, &c.:" he would not value himself on any thing which he had received, attained to, or performed, either before or since his conversion, except in his dependence on the sufferings and death of Christ upon the cross, as a sacrifice for sin, and in the hopes, comforts, and blessings, which he thence had derived. In this, indeed, he greatly gloried, and his view of the cross of Christ, and of the obligations, motives, and instructions, connected with it, had crucified the world to him, and him to the world. 'So that he viewed 'the world, as little impressed by all its charms, as a 'spectator would be by any thing that had been graceful 'in the countenance of a crucified person, when he beholds it blackened in the agonies of death, and was no 'more affected by the objects around him, than one that 'is expiring would be struck with any of those prospects, 'which his dying eyes might view from the cross on 'which he was suspended.' (Doddridge.) He disdained the friendship, riches, honours, and pleasures of the world, and disregarded its reproach and hatred, as he would have done those of a crucified malefactor, seeing in the cross of Christ the condemnation of all unbelievers without distinction; and the love of all things of a worldly nature was crucified by his view of the holiness of God, the evil of sin, the wickedness of man, and the importance of eternity, which the cross of Christ exhibited, and by that grace which he died to procure for him. To show forth the love of his crucified Lord, to point him out to sinners, to honour him in his own conduct, and to teach others to love and glorify him, was the great business of his life; all else was comparatively beneath his notice. This raised him above all regard to circumcision or uncircumcision, assured that regeneration, or a new creation to the image of Christ, as evidential of faith in him, was the great distinction between one man and another; (Notes, 2 Cor. v. 17—20:) and to all men, Jewish or Gentile converts, who walked with God, as in Christ, new creatures, glorying in his cross only, and crucified by it to the world, he desired that mercy and peace might abound, even to the true Israel of God, as distinguished from the unbelieving nation of Israel.

V. 17, 18. As what had been written was abundantly sufficient to satisfy all humble inquiries, the apostle desired that he might not thenceforth be troubled and disquieted by such disputations; they ought not thus to add to his sufferings, for he already bore in his body the marks and scars of the wounds which he had received in the cause of Christ, and which he deemed far more honourable than the external badge of circumcision.—Some think, that the marks which slaves and soldiers received, showing to what master or commander they belonged, are alluded to. But the scars of the stripes and wounds, which he had received for Christ's sake, are certainly meant. These ought to have endeared him to them, as he exposed himself to such persecutions for their good. He therefore desired, that the grace and free favour of Christ might be with their souls, to comfort, establish, and sanctify them; and then he knew that they would be more affectionate to him, and less attached to mere externals.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10.

There is a great difference between those who habitually live in known sin; and those who are overtaken with a fault, to which the best of men are liable. The reality and degree of our spirituality should be evinced by tender and compassionate endeavours to restore the fallen and confirm the weak, in the spirit of meekness; as conscious that we too are liable to be tempted, and have need of humble watchfulness, and constant dependence upon God. Our Christian liberty is enjoyed in proportion as we "fulfil the law of Christ," in loving the brethren, and bearing one another's burdens, with compassion and self-denial. But, alas! many think themselves to be something when they are nothing, and so deceive themselves. Let us then prove our own work; and seek rejoicing in the assurance of our own conversion, and not in the opinion of others concerning us; seeing that "every man must bear "his own burden." They who love the Gospel, and are taught according to the word of God, will not grudge the faithful minister a proportion of their good things: men may in this and in other matters impose on others, as well as deceive themselves; but God will not be trifled with. As the present is our seed-time for eternity, let us examine what we are now sowing; and what our harvest is likely to prove. If hitherto any man have sown to the flesh, and is afraid that "of the flesh he shall reap corruption;" let him begin, by repentance, faith, and prayer, to sow to the Spirit, that he may at length reap everlasting life. And let none of us, who have begun thus to sow to the Spirit, "grow weary in well doing; assured that in due "season we shall reap if we faint not." Not only do those, who have no root in themselves, lose all their labour about religion, by drawing back in the time of temptation; but even believers often lose much of the comfort and usefulness, that they were likely to obtain, by fainting in part through disappointment, and want of zeal and patience. Let us then watch against this; remembering that we are the servants of Christ, whose work it is, "as "we have opportunity, to do good to all men, especially "to the household of faith."

V. 11—18.

There have always been professors and teachers, who desired to make a fair show in the flesh, to render religion subservient to worldly interests or distinctions, and to escape the cross. Such men will commonly be more zealous to make proselytes to a party, than converts to Christ; that they may glory in the numbers who are attached to them. But the consistent Christian is nobly disdainful of these low aims: he only glories in the cross of Christ, as the Foundation of all his hopes; and this faith in a crucified Saviour crucifies the world to him, and him unto the world; as he desires to "live no longer to "himself, but to him who died for him, and rose again." Thus he overcomes the love of worldly objects, and is reconciled to hardships, poverty, reproach, and hatred for his Lord's sake. If we then are in Christ, new creatures, we have the kernel and the substance of religion, and may leave others to quarrel about the shell or the shadow of it. Yet we should desire that mercy and peace may be upon all, who walk according to this rule, and upon the whole Israel of God. They are peculiarly blameable, who trouble and grieve those soldiers of Christ, who bear in their bodies the scars of the wounds which they have received in fighting the good fight: but we should not wonder, if our most disinterested and self-denying labours meet with this recompense alone, from those whom we have most loved. And we must still pray, that the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ may be with their spirits; as well as expostulate with them concerning their misconduct.

THE

TO THE EPHESIANS.

'Although it does not appear to have ever been disputed, that the epistle before us was written by St. Paul, yet it is well known, that a doubt has long been entertained concerning the persons to whom it was addressed. The question is founded on some ambiguity in the external evidence. Marcion, a heretic of the second century, as quoted by Tertullian, calls it the Epistle to the Laodiceans. The name, Ephesus, in the first verse, upon which word singly depends the proof that the epistle was written to the Ephesians, is not read in all the manuscripts now extant. I admit, however, that the external evidence preponderates, with a manifest excess, on the side of the received reading.' (Paley.) The same learned writer proceeds to argue, from internal evidence, that the epistle could hardly be written to a people with whom the apostle had resided three years: and it must be acknowledged, that in this respect it more resembles the epistle to the Romans, and that to the Colossians, than those epistles which the apostle wrote to the Corinthians, Galatians, Philippians, and Thessalonians; in which there are constant allusions and appeals to what had past when he resided among them. As, however, the external evidence preponderates with a manifest excess, in favour of the received reading, it is in this exposition adhered to: though it may be observed, that the change of the word Ephesus for Laodicea, or the total omission of it, would in no respect deduct from the abundant instruction, contained in the epistle itself. 'It has been said, that if this epistle was directed to the Ephesians, it is difficult to understand how the apostle contented himself with a general salutation. But there are no particular salutations, in the epistles to the Galatians, &c.: because, to have sent particular salutations to individuals, in Churches where the apostle was so generally and intimately acquainted, might have offended those who were neglected. And to have mentioned every person of note, would have taken up too much room. In writing to the Romans, the case was different. The apostle was personally unknown to most of them; and he could take particular notice of all his acquaintance.' (Macknight.) The successful ministry of the apostle in the renowned, but licentious, city of Ephesus; and his solemn charge to the elders of the Church, which was there collected, have before been considered; (Notes, Acts xix. xx.) Some years after, he wrote this epistle during his imprisonment at Rome, and probably near the close of it; to establish them in the great doctrines of the Gospel, to guard them against errors, excite them to a holy conversation, and to animate them in their Christian warfare. This epistle, and the two that follow it, which were also written during his imprisonment, and probably about the same time, are remarkable for a peculiar pathos and ardour, or rapture, as some have called it; and this is generally ascribed to the extraordinary consolations enjoyed by the apostle during his sufferings for Christ's sake. But his mind was doubtless enlarged to a remarkable degree in writing to those whom he had no occasion to rebuke, and with whom he was not under the necessity of engaging in controversy: so that, entire confidence of affection took place of that caution, reserve, or sharpness, which were requisite in the three preceding epistles. Learned men, according to their different hypotheses, suppose, that the apostle continually refers, in this epistle, to the mysteries of Diana, to the Gnostics, or to the Judaizing teachers; but it may fairly be questioned, whether, writing with an inexpressible flow of holy affections, on the great subjects which rejoiced his heart, he had express reference to any of those things which expositors, more coldly speculating on his words, have thought of. Perhaps, he had some general regard to the Judaizing corruptors of the Gospel: but, as the epistle to the Colossians, which was written about the same time, and in other respects greatly resembles this, is far more explicit on that subject, it may be supposed that the Ephesians were less in danger from that quarter.

CHAP. I.

The apostle salutes the Ephesians, 1, 2. He blesses God for the spiritual blessings, which he had conferred on them and him, as chosen in Christ, and predestinated to the adoption of children, 3—5; as accepted in the Beloved, through the redemption of his blood, and his grace abounding towards them, in all wisdom, 6—8; as gathered, and made heirs, with his people, to the praise of his glory, by first trusting in Christ, 9—12; and as sealed by the Spirit of adoption, the Earnest of their inheritance, 13, 14. He thanks God for them, and prays that God would more completely illuminate them, and give them deeper experience of the grace and comforts of the Gospel, 15—18; according to the mighty power, by which Christ had been raised from the dead, and exalted as Head over all things to his church, 19—23.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1, 2. (Notes, Rom. i. 1—7.) By "the "faithful in Christ Jesus," the apostle might mean, either believers in Christ, or such as approved themselves to be his faithful soldiers, servants, and stewards. Some have supposed, that the expression was intended to include other believers, as well as the saints at Ephesus, but it may be rendered, "even the faithful in Christ Jesus." (Marg. Ref.) Grace. (2.) 'This grace is given by the communication of the Holy Ghost, from the Father, and the 'Son, to the Church; (John xiv. 23;) which is the reason 'that the Holy Ghost is not mentioned in these salutations.' (Whitby.)

V. 3—8. The following twelve verses, properly speaking, form one period. The apostle's mind was so full of his subject, that he was not very exact about his style: and this renders a double degree of attention requisite in the reader, who would fully enter into his meaning. We shall, however, better understand his argument and doctrine, by considering the passage in a more detached manner. Reflecting on the great things which God had done for him, and by him, especially among the Gentiles, the apostle broke out into the most rapturous praises and thanksgiving unto God on that account.—He could do no other than speak well concerning the God and Father of the Lord Jesus, and celebrate the praises of his name, who had done so well and graciously by his believing people, and had conferred on them all spiritual blessings, that could be desired, or enjoyed, in respect of heavenly things, and as the earnest of heavenly felicity; by giving his Son Jesus Christ for them, and by calling them to believe in him; or by exalting Christ, as their Surety, Advocate, and fore-runner, into the heavenly places, God had at once, as it were, conferred all spiritual blessings on every believer, as united unto him, and interested in him. This resulted from his choice of them, in Christ, and as given to him, even "before the "foundation of the world;" not because he foresaw they would of themselves be more holy than others of their fallen race; but that they should be made holy, by separation from sin, consecration unto God, and the sanctification of the Spirit, in consequence of their election in Christ. Thus he purposed to render them "blameless "before him, in love;" not only in respect of their complete justification in Christ; but by their present integrity and sincerity in the professed love of Christ, of each other, and of all men; by their blameless walk before God, in all his ordinances and commandments;

9 Having [d] made known unto us the mystery of his will, [e] according to his good pleasure, which he hath [f] purposed in himself:

10 That, [g] in the dispensation of the fulness of times, [h] he might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in * heaven, and which are on earth, even in him:

and at length by making them perfect in holy love and heavenly felicity. For he had "predestinated," or fore-ordained, them to be adopted as his children, by faith in Jesus Christ; and to be openly admitted to the privileges of that high relation to himself, notwithstanding their original and actual sinfulness. In doing this according to his sovereign will and pleasure, he intended to exhibit the glory of his rich, free, and distinguishing grace in the most illustrious manner, that they and others might celebrate the praises of it for ever: as by that glorious grace he had made them, (lost sinners both of the Jews and Gentiles,) "accepted in his beloved" Son, and the "right-"eousness of God in him:" so that, as the Father was well-pleased in his beloved Son, he was also well-pleased with them for his sake. Or hath "highly favoured us in "him;" as a word of the same import is elsewhere rendered; (Luke i. 28;) including all other blessings, as flowing, without fail, from their justification in Christ.—For though in themselves they had been condemned criminals, enslaved and imprisoned under the curse of the law, and the power of sin and Satan, without any possibility of delivering themselves, yet Christ had paid a complete ransom for their souls, when he shed his blood on the cross, and, having been brought into a state of union with him by regeneration and faith, they had obtained a complete redemption; their sins having been fully pardoned, and their souls set at liberty from the fetters and dungeon of their former wretched condition.—This deliverance accorded to the unspeakable abundance of God's free mercy and grace: his love appointed this method of redemption, provided the Redeemer, spared not his own Son, brought them to hear and embrace this salvation, freely pardoned all their sins, gave liberty to their captive souls, supplied all their wants, and invested them with the richest variety of privileges and blessings. In exercising such astonishing grace, after so abundant a manner, the Lord had also acted with all wisdom and prudent counsel: for whereas mercy to criminals often gives encouragement to crimes, and disgraces or weakens the hands of government, this method of grace was so wisely ordered, that it showed sin in all its odiousness and desert of vengeance; exhibited the divine justice and holiness in the most tremendous glory; manifested all the attributes of God in glorious harmony; furnished the most effectual motives to the believer's future obedience; and tended directly to subvert Satan's empire of ungodliness and iniquity. So that the wisdom of God never shone so bright in the view of all holy intelligences, as in this display of the riches of his glorious grace. (Notes, Rom. iii. 19—31. viii. 28—39.) Exalted and mysterious wisdom had also been displayed in all the steps by which the way was prepared for the revelation of this plan, and in the time and manner in which it was revealed. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9—12. The blessings before mentioned were communicated to believers, by the Lord's making known to them the mystery of his sovereign will, respecting the method of redemption and salvation, and the admission of sinners into his family by faith in Christ, whether they were Jews or Gentiles. All these arrangements had been made "according to his good pleasure, which he had "purposed in himself;" for as he advised with no counsellor, so he gave no account of his holy, wise, and righteous appointments. Having revealed these things to the apostles, and by them to the Church, his divine teaching had led those whom he had chosen to see the glory of those truths, which others were left to blaspheme. Thus were they made to know the mystery of his will, and to understand, that in the dispensation, which at length in the fulness of times had been introduced, the Lord meant to gather together, as into one kingdom or family, in his beloved Son, and under his government, all things in heaven and earth. So that not only Jews and Gentiles would become one Church: not only were the saints, who had before gone to heaven, to be considered as one body with believers on earth; but even holy angels, and all the inhabitants of heaven, as confirmed in Christ, and his worshippers and subjects, would form one kingdom with redeemed sinners, and join with them in love, adoration, and obedience. By virtue of their relation to Christ and union with him, the apostle and the Jewish converts had obtained a share in this glorious inheritance; having been predestinated, according to the sovereign appointment of that glorious God, who carries on his work of creation, providence, and redemption, according to those wise counsels, and that perfect plan, which he hath seen good to form And while most of their countrymen had been left to judicial blindness and unbelief, to be monuments of God's awful justice, they had been selected "for the "praise of his glory," being brought to trust in Christ for salvation, (Marg. Ref.) by the power of divine grace, as the first-fruits of the Christian-Church, though in themselves deserving of wrath, no less than their unbelieving Jewish brethren. Gather, &c. ‘from God, are gathered together; of whom were some ‘in the heavens, when he came on earth, (who indeed ‘had been gathered together, by faith in him who was ‘to come;) others being found on earth, were gathered ‘together, and are daily gathered to him.’ (Beza.) The union of angels with redeemed sinners, in one company of worshippers, seems also intended.

V. 13, 14. Not only the Jews, who had embraced the Gospel, but the Gentile converts also, especially those at Ephesus, had, “to the praise of the divine glory,” been led to believe and hope in Christ; when the word of truth, the glad tidings which proposed salvation to them, had been preached among them, in whom, “after “they had believed,” or believing, they had been sealed by the Holy Spirit, who had been promised by the ancient prophets, and by Christ before his ascension into heaven. This cannot be exclusively explained of miraculous powers. These were not the earnest, pledge, and foretaste of heaven, as this seal is declared to have been; for many unsanctified persons have exercised miraculous powers. But the sanctifying and comforting influences of the Holy Spirit seal believers as the children of God and heirs of heaven; they are the first-fruits of that holy felicity, and they impress the holy image of God upon their souls. (Note, 2 Cor. i. 21, 22.) Thus the Ephesian converts were preserved, supported, and comforted, and would be during their time of trial and suffering in life and death, till they should at last be put in full possession of that complete redemption, which Christ had ensured to his purchased people: or till the inheritance, which sin had forfeited, but which Christ had purchased for them, should be, so to speak, fully rescued from the hands of their enemies, and they put in complete possession of it at the resurrection of the dead; to be for ever monuments erected “to the praise of the glory of “God.” All these things are so evidently distinguishing of true Christians, and so inapplicable to collective bodies of professors, that we must conclude the apostle spoke of election as personal and gratuitous; and of effectual vocation as inseparably connected with eternal life: and learned men need far more ingenuity than has yet been employed in the argument, to make the apostle’s words speak any other language, consistently with the rules of grammar and of common sense. (Notes, Rom. viii. 28—39. ix. xi.)

V. 15—23. The apostle had for some time witnessed the conduct of the Ephesians: but having been absent from them at least five years, he had again heard of their faith in Christ, and love to all his saints; which excited him, without ceasing, to thank God for his grace and mercy towards them, and animated him in mentioning them expressly by name, in all his secret and social prayers. Especially he entreated the God, whom the Lord Jesus Christ, as man, had worshipped and obeyed, (even the glorious Father, the great Author of all that glory which is visible in the whole universe,) that he would still more abundantly communicate to them the Holy Spirit, from whose influence all divine wisdom was derived to men; and who discovered to the hearts of believers the certainty, nature, and glory of those truths, which by prophets and apostles he had revealed to the Church. That so every veil of prejudice, pride, and sin, being removed, they might more completely know God in Christ, and more confi-

CHAP. II.

The apostle shows the Ephesians their former corrupt state, as slaves of Satan and children of disobedience; among whom he and all others once were, being by nature the children of wrath, even as they, 1—3. All are saved by grace, in Christ, through faith, and thus created unto good works, 4—10. The Gentiles were once without Christ, without hope, without God; but by the special grace of God, through the atonement of Christ, all, who believed, were brought nigh, and reconciled to God; had access to him; were formed into one church with Jewish converts, (the ritual law being taken away by the death of Christ,) and so became an habitation of God through the Spirit, 11—22.

dently acknowledge their relation to him; that, the eyes of their minds being divinely illuminated, they might understand more clearly, and experience more deeply, the value of that Object of their hope, to which God had called them by his Gospel; and perceive what riches of grace, consolation, and spiritual blessings, were comprised in that glory, which constituted the inheritance conferred on his saints; or the rich abundance and revenue of glory, which the Lord would derive from his saints, as his chosen inheritance. And that they might perceive what exceeding greatness of divine power had been exerted in their conversion to the faith; and was still engaged to uphold, strengthen, and defend them, to perfect their new creation, and to complete their redemption from Satan, sin, and death; according to the operation of that mighty power, which was put forth in the resurrection and exaltation of Christ. It is remarkable that the apostle seems here, studiously, to have exhausted the utmost vigour of the Greek language to express, by a beautiful accumulation of energetic words, the omnipotence of God, as effecting the believer's conversion and salvation, in continuing, as it were, that exertion of it, by which the Redeemer was raised from the dead. For, in consequence of the resurrection of Christ, he had been exalted in the human nature to the right-hand of the Father, on the mediatorial throne in heavenly places, far above all creatures, however dignified; not only above the princes of the earth; not only as the conqueror and destroyer of the powers of darkness; but even far above the hierarchies of heaven, however distinguished as principalities, powers, &c.; yea, above every name, that ever was, or will be, celebrated on earth or in heaven, either during the continuance of this world, or that which is to come. And as all creatures were subjected to his government, so all enemies were virtually put under his feet; seeing he hath power and authority to crush them as he pleases; and will continue to do this in the proper seasons, till the last enemy shall be destroyed. (Note, 1 Cor. xv. 24—28.) Having thus exalted the risen Saviour, the Father hath constituted him absolute and universal Governor of the world, and given him to be the Head of the Church, that he might employ his unbounded authority, and almighty power, for its benefit: so that the whole is exercised in subserviency to his purposes of grace, and to render effectual his redemption, in the final salvation of his purchased people. For his Church is his body; he is the Head of life, and authority to the whole company of believers, as united to him; and they are dear to him, and taken care of by him, as the members of his body: so that he, "in whom all fulness dwells," is not complete in his mediatorial character, except in the preservation and full salvation of his whole mystical body. And while he fills heaven and earth with his glory, he fills his ordinances with his power and gracious presence, and dwells in every believer, by his Spirit of life, purity, and love; he condescends to deem them essential to his own fulness of glory; even as every member of the body is to the completeness of the human nature.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

Faith in Christ, and faithfulness to him, unite to form the character of his saints; and to the sovereign grace of God we wholly owe it, if we are either true believers or ministers. God our Father, from whom, and the Lord Jesus, through whom grace and peace are given to sinful men, are to be adored and praised for all those spiritual blessings with which we are, or hope to be, blessed, in time and to eternity. The appointment of the eternal Son of the Father, as the Surety for fallen man, in the divine foreknowledge, even before the foundation of the world, is the source of all the hopes and comforts of those who "were chosen in him, that they should be holy, and "without blame before him in love." For personal holiness was provided for, in every part of the counsels of God, respecting man's salvation. So that the renewal of our hearts to the divine image, and a blameless walk before God, in love of him and of our brethren, are the proper evidences that we are predestinated, and have been called, by God, to "the adoption of children by Jesus Christ "unto himself, according to the good pleasure of his will." For when this purpose of God began to take effect, by our being "made accepted in his beloved Son, in whom "we obtain redemption through faith in his blood, even "the forgiveness of our sins according to the riches of his "grace:" then, as the children of God, who is LOVE, we began to bear his image and become followers of him. Thus the change wrought, as well as the mercy shown, are "to the praise of the glory of his grace:" the reconciled rebel, the adopted son, gives all the praise of his salvation to his gracious Father; his actions, (as well as his lips,) declare the praises of the divine mercy; and it appears evident, that adorable wisdom and prudence conjoined with unspeakakle grace in forming and executing the holy plan of man's salvation.

been for ever hidden from us, if he had not made them known to us by his Gospel, and his Spirit of truth. Thus, in every respect, he dispenses his blessings according to "his good pleasure, which he hath purposed in himself." In executing his grand design of "gathering together in "one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and "in earth," he hath brought us to seek and obtain an inheritance among his redeemed people; and we must allow, that we were "predestinated according to the "purpose of him, who worketh all things after the "counsel of his own will." He sent the word of truth, the Gospel of salvation, to us, while others were left in darkness; he quickened us, when others were left dead in sin; he enabled us to trust in Christ, as well as sealed our pardon by his sanctifying Spirit, as the earnest of our future glorious inheritance. We need not wonder that the self-wise and self-sufficient men deride and dispute against these humbling and spiritual mysteries; nor is it at all desirable that they should embrace them, as a scheme of doctrine, in a carnal mind. But that humble believers, who allow their own hearts to be as evil, except as renewed by divine grace, as those of their most irreligious neighbours, should be afraid of tracing back their present experience of that grace to the sovereign purpose and electing love of God in Christ; that in giving him the whole glory of having made them to differ, they may also possess a ground of assurance of his perfecting his good work in their souls; this, I say, is matter of surprise to those who find the sweetest animation and encouragement from the glorious review and prospect.

V. 15—23.

If any, who appear to have faith in the Lord Jesus, and love to all the saints, are dazzled by these sublime mysteries, their more established brethren should not forget who made them to differ; and, instead of forming rash judgments, and engaging in violent disputations, (which are peculiarly unsuitable on this subject,) they should thank God for what he hath done for them, and pray always for those whom they deem mistaken. Indeed, we all need to pray for ourselves and each other, "to the "God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory," for a large communication of "the Spirit of wisdom and reve-"lation in the knowledge of him." We shall do far more in this way towards bringing believers to be of one mind and judgment, than by eager disputations: "for a man can "receive nothing, except it be given him from above;" and high confidence, on one side of the question, commonly excites the same on the other side, with all its hateful consequences. But, if we disputed with less earnestness, and prayed with greater fervency for each other, the eyes of our understanding being enlightened, we should daily see more and more, "what is the hope of our calling, and "the riches of the divine glory, in the inheritance of his "saints." When most sensible of our own weakness, and the power of our enemies, we shall most perceive and experience the greatness of that mighty power, which hath effected our conversion, and is engaged to perfect our salvation. For the resurrection and exaltation of Christ, his universal and sovereign authority, and almighty power, were all intended for our benefit, if we are indeed the members of his mystical body the Church; which is "the "fulness of him who filleth all in all." The immensity of this love and condescension, and the vastness of our privileges, should excite our enlarged expectations; our unspeakable obligations, if duly apprehended, will constrain us by love to live to our Redeemer's glory; and thus our humble, holy, and cheerful lives will vindicate our doctrine from the calumnies of those who speak evil of such things as they understand not.

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1, 2. The almighty power of God, which raised Christ from the dead, (i. 20;) had also raised to spiritual life the Ephesians, who had been dead in sin: for the words, "hath he quickened," seem to have been properly, from the fifth verse, supplied by our translators: as, in the original, that verse appears to take up and conclude the sentence here begun, merely by changing you into us, entirely in the apostle's manner. Death in trespasses and sins implies an utter incapacity for spiritual employments and satisfactions; the want of all desire after that felicity which holy creatures enjoy in the favour and service of God; and a total inability of worshipping and obeying him with love and delight: even as a dead man is utterly incapable of the business or pleasures of life. The employments and enjoyments of animal nature, and even those of a rational being, are within the capacities of a man who is dead in sin; but he cannot relish or desire spiritual pleasures. He may be an epicure, or a philosopher; but he cannot find satisfaction in the peculiar employments of a saint. For he must be carnal; and the carnal mind is enmity against God, and in opposition to the holy law. Such a man therefore must be an apostate, and an idolater, who seeks happiness in the creature, not in the Creator: and he can only live to transgress, to pursue carnal things, to corrupt himself and others, and to aggravate his condemnation, as a transgressor of the divine law. In such sins and trespasses the Ephesians had habitually walked; and had gone about, under an accumulating load of guilt, and the power of their evil propensities, without any concern about the consequences. In this they had proceeded according to the customs, fashions, and maxims "of this present evil "world." (Note, Gal. i. 4.) They did like their neighbours, and like other men all over the earth. Thus to live

"according to the course of this world," was to live according to the will of the devil: a dreadful advance on the preceding clause, though evidently contained in it. At this time therefore they lived according to the example and temptations of Satan, the god and prince of this world, that arch-apostate and rebel, who has the seat of his empire in the air, and there exerts his power and influence. This, at least, accorded to the notions then prevalent among the Jews, and even among the Gentiles, concerning their genii and demons; which, whether to be understood literally or figuratively, was sufficient for the apostle's purpose. There Satan, and the legions of fallen angels which are subordinate to him, continually wait their opportunity of tempting men to sin, by removing from their minds good thoughts and serious impressions, and suggesting others of a contrary tendency. In this way he maintains his dominion; and men in general copy his example of rebellion, enmity, and contemptuous defiance of God; of pride, ambition, envy, malice, deceit, murder, and destruction: or they gratify his malignity by destroying themselves and each other, through gross sensualities, or by war and bloodshed; or his ambition, by idolatry, impiety, and infidelity. Thus the Ephesians had walked according to that spirit, which still worked in the children of disobedience, or in those who continued in unbelief and rebellion against God. Or, as it may be more literally rendered, "according to the prince of that "spirit, which now worketh, &c." Satan is the author and ruler of that proud, carnal, and impious spirit, or disposition, which is in ungodly men: his temptations first produced it in human nature; and he works on it by the agency of evil spirits, to instigate it to all wickedness, in thought, word, and deed: thus he rules in man's heart; he possesses, as it were, all unbelievers; and he inspires with wit and ingenuity the advocates for vice, impiety, and infidelity, by whom he maintains his empire in the world.

Children of disobedience. (Marg. Ref. Note, v. 6.)

V. 3. The apostle before spoke of the Gentile converts exclusively, at least principally: but here, (in the same manner as in the epistle to the Romans he proved the Jews also to be under sin,) he turns his discourse, and includes both himself, and all the converts from that nation, among those who once were dead in sin, and slaves to Satan: and he proceeds to use the first person plural to the end of the seventh verse, and then he again addresses the Gentile converts. He could not mean the Jews, say many learned men, because they had not been idolaters. But had the apostle mentioned idolatry? and is there no way of conforming to the world and serving the devil, except by idolatry? To suppose that the apostle spake of himself, as one of the Gentiles, or one of the Church of Rome, chiefly consisting of Gentile converts, because he then resided there, is so absurd in itself, so unsuitable to his argument, so needless, after what he had said of the Gentiles, and so contrary to his language, and that of the most eminent saints, in other parts of Scripture, (Marg. Ref.); that nothing, it may fairly be presumed, could have reconciled so many learned writers to it, but the necessity of adopting it, in order to avoid the doctrine of original sin, in the strict and proper meaning of the terms, as true of all men, Jew, Gentile, or Christian, as 'naturally engendered of Adam's race;' and so to avoid also the doctrine of regeneration, or a real new creation of the soul, by the power of the Holy Spirit. The author of these notes was once deeply engaged in this scheme, being strongly attached to Mr. Locke's views; and had begun to compose a sermon according to it, when this very text, occurring to his mind, shook his whole system to the foundation. This is more than thirty years since, and he has had abundant time, and has bestowed no little pains, in reconsidering the subject; but is deeply convinced that the interpretation is wholly unscriptural, and that it tends to evaporate the meaning of the sacred oracles, as if we had little concern in the greatest part of them. Not only were the idolatrous Ephesians thus dead in sin, and under the power of Satan; but the apostle, and all other Christians then on earth, had in times past their conversation among them, as alienated from God, and disobedient to him. They lived "in the lusts of their flesh," or according to the desires of their carnal hearts; gratifying their animal appetites in sensual wickedness; or the proud, covetous, ambitious, and malignant tempers of their minds, as constitution, custom, or education swayed them; without any proper regard to the authority, will, glory, or favour of God. So that the Jews, as well as the Gentiles, and the Christians, as well as those who remained unconverted, were "by nature" dead in sin, "and children of "wrath," one as well as another. For, being born of Adam's fallen race, averse to good and prone to evil, they were alike, in the temper of their hearts and the conduct of their lives, deserving of, and meet for, the wrath of God. Great pains, as has been observed, have been employed to prove, that nature may signify custom, or habitual practice. But they who, with immense erudition, labour, and ingenuity, have spent themselves in this vain attempt, have been evidently baffled in the critical argument, by men of far inferior learning; so that they seem nearly silenced. At the same time, stubborn facts prove, that men called Christians are "dead in sin," as much as the Gentiles were; and that the children of believers are as prone to evil and averse to good, as those of idolaters: nor can any man suppose, that worldly lusts are more excusable in Christians, than in heathens. The word rendered "by nature," seems never to have been used for any other customs, than such as resulted from innate propensities: and the whole tenour of the Scripture, as well as the experience and confessions of the most pious persons who ever lived, confirm our interpretation, and expressly contradict that more flattering one, which many have attempted to substitute in its place.

V. 4—10. Even when the apostle and his fellow-christians, whether Jews or Gentiles, were dead in sin, incapable of helping themselves, and hateful in the sight of God, he loved them with an exceedingly great love: not for any thing which he saw, or foresaw, in them, but because "he was rich in mercy," and delighted in the most abundant and illustrious exercise of it. Having therefore loved them, and given his own Son to die for their sins, and raised him as their Surety from the dead, the same immensely free mercy influenced him to raise them from the death of sin, by a continuation of that powerful operation. Thus he "quickened them together "with Christ," in virtue of his resurrection, with life communicated from him, by the holy Spirit. So that they were saved, or had been saved, wholly by unmerited grace; whether their election, redemption, or conversion, were considered. Being thus raised to a new life, in conformity to their risen Lord, they in him, their Head, Representative, and Surety, were "made to sit in heavenly "places;" their future glory was ensured by his ascension and exaltation, and by their union with him; and their treasures, hearts, and hopes, were already in heaven with Christ their Life. (Marg. Ref.) This whole plan had been formed and executed, that "in the ages to come," in future generations, and future worlds, the Lord might display the exceeding riches and abundance of his grace, by the astonishing kindness shown to such vile sinners in Christ Jesus; that so men and angels, and all created intelligences, to eternity might behold, admire, and adore his glorious mercy and love in these transactions. The apostle would therefore repeat and enlarge upon the hint before given, that "they were saved by grace;" they were brought into a state of full security by the mere mercy of God, through faith in Christ: and even this faith, which effected their relation to him, was not of themselves; their proud and carnal minds having been utterly averse to the humbling and spiritual doctrine; but it was the free gift of God to them, the effect of their being quickened, or regenerated, by his Spirit. Thus their pride and enmity, their love of sin and the world, were subdued, and they were brought to believe the Gospel, and trust in Christ. This salvation therefore was, in no degree, or way, of works of any kind; that so no man should have any ground of boasting, that he did of himself contribute any thing to his own happiness, or of glorying over his neighbour. (Notes, Rom. iii. 19—28. 1 Cor. i. 29—31.) For though believers differed greatly from other men, and from their former selves, this was the effect of a divine power exerted upon them: they were "the work-"manship of God," who in Christ had wrought a real new creation upon their souls; giving new principles or propensities to their several faculties, and a new direction to their affections and desires. Thus their disposition and ability to love God, and to do good works, should be considered as a part of their salvation, not as the cause of it: for it was the purpose of God, that his redeemed people should habitually walk in good works, from their conversion, till they finished their course; and their holy lives were the effect, evidence, and recommendation of their salvation by grace. 'Both faith and works are God's 'workmanship; both are necessary; but the one the fruit 'of the other.' (Maclaurin.) The term, "good works," is never used, in the New Testament, for ritual obedience, or moral virtue, as practised by unbelievers, or for any other works than the fruits of the Spirit. If any one doubt of this, let him consult the marginal references, or a good concordance. This the author was not aware of when he wrote this note for the former edition, or he perhaps should have enlarged on the idea of the disposition and ability to do good works being a part of our salvation; and so in no sense a cause of it. For, without doubt, regeneration and sanctification by the Spirit of Christ are as much a part of our salvation, as redemption and justification. Some have objected to the word prepared being used, instead of ordained; but it is the marginal reading, and the more literal. Perhaps provided answers the idea as accurately as any other word. Ordained, for set in order, (Ps. viii. 3.) gives the real meaning.—Walking in good works forms an essential part of that plan, which God has set in order for man's salvation: and he prepares believers by his grace to fall in with this arrangement.

V. 11—13. Having spoken of the general state of fallen man, and the salvation of all believers by mere grace, the apostle next proceeded to show the Gentile converts the peculiarities of their case, which had placed them further out of the way of mercy than the Jews had been. He would have them remember, that they had not only been dead in sin, but "Gentiles in the flesh," as to their outward state, their gross idolatries, immoralities, and sensuality; so that they had been called the Uncircumcision, in contempt and aversion, as polluted and out of covenant with God, even by the Jews, who had only the outward circumcision in the flesh, of man's operation, without the "circumcision of the heart." At that time they were in every sense without, or separate from, Christ; being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel and its peculiar advantages, as the visible church of God, in which his ordinances were administered, his oracles deposited, and the expectation of a Messiah maintained. They had also been strangers to the Abrahamic covenant, to that made with Israel at Sinai, to the covenant of royalty, and to that of the priesthood; in all which the Messiah was the great blessing that was promised. So that, whatever notions they might have of a future state, they had nothing on which to ground a hope of acceptance and happiness in it: all their expectations of that kind were mere presumption; and whatever demons, idols, or imaginary beings, they worshipped, they were indeed atheists as to the only true God, and as to the effect of their fables or speculations upon their conduct: "in the "world;" which was the same, or as bad as it would have been, if they all had been avowed atheists; seeing that their abominable idolatry led them into more immorality than it restrained them from, besides the impiety inherent in it. But at length they, who had been by nature, practice, custom, and external situation, so far off from the worship, service, love, favour, and image of God, were brought nigh to him, as in Christ Jesus, by faith: thus they were admitted into a state of acceptance, reconciliation, and friendship with God, through the atoning blood of Christ; and were become his peculiar people and spiritual worshippers. How rude and affronting would a company of unhumbled impenitent sinners, especially in a superior station of life, consider it; should a friend in a letter, or a minister in a sermon, address them in this language? If no man knoweth the Father, but he to whom the Son reveals him, all men, who reject the Gospel, whether idolaters, unbelieving Jews, Mahometans, or Deists, must be "without God," according to the apostle's meaning in that expression. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 14—18. In every sense, Christ was to be considered as their Peace; the Author, Centre, and Substance of reconciliation to God, and of the union of Gentile converts with Jewish believers in one church. For he had effected a cordial peace between those discordant parties, (who had before exceedingly despised, and even detested, each other;) by breaking down that partition-wall, which had so long separated the Jews from the Gentiles: namely, the ceremonial law, to which the Gentiles were extremely averse, even when otherwise favourable to the worship of JEHOVAH; and of which the Jews were tenacious and proud, to a degree of disgusting bigotry. But Christ, by assuming human nature, and fulfilling, in his priestly character, especially by his sacrifice on the cross, these typical institutions, had abolished them; and thus removed the ground of enmity of the Jews and Gentiles against each other concerning them. So that this law, the commands of which consisted of external ordinances, having lost all its use and obligation; the Gentiles were admitted into the Christian Church, without submitting to the yoke, or being deemed unclean because uncircumcised. Thus they became one body with the believing Jews; that so Christ might create, as it were, "One new man," consisting of regenerate persons, both Jews and Gentiles, united to himself the Head, quickened by his Spirit, walking in newness of life, harmonious in worship and obedience, and mutually loving and doing good to one another. (Notes, &c. Is. xi. 1—9. 1 Cor. xii.) In this way, Christ was the Peace-maker between Jews and Gentiles; and at the same time he reconciled both of them in one body unto God. For the ceremonial law implied man's state of condemnation, pollution, and enmity against God; to whom he could not approach, except on a mercy-seat, and by priests, sacrifices, incense, and purifications, being, after all, kept at a great distance from him: but the death of Christ upon the cross took away the guilt which was the cause of the enmity; that so a holy God might honourably pardon, and be reconciled to, his rebellious creatures; and it made way for the communication of his Holy Spirit to regenerate sinners, and so to destroy the enmity of their hearts against the holy character, worship, and service of God. (Notes, 2 Cor. v. 17—21.) Having finished this great design, he came, by his apostles and ministers, to preach peace with God, and with each other, to the Gentiles, who had been far off, and to the Jews, who were outwardly nigh to God. For through the Person, sacrifice, and mediation of Christ, sinners of all descriptions were allowed access to God, as a Father; and were introduced with acceptance into his presence, with their worship and services, under the immediate teaching and influence of the Holy Spirit, as one with the Father and the Son, in this great work of salvation, as well as in the unity of the Godhead: (Is. lvii. 19.) It should be noticed, that in the seventeenth verse, the apostle, distinguishing the Gentile converts from the Jewish, says, "you that were far off;" thus evidently ranging himself among the Jewish converts who were comparatively nigh. This is natural, and perfectly destructive of that unnatural interpretation, by which he is supposed to include himself among the Gentile converts. The wall, which separated the uncircumcised Gentiles, who came to worship the God of Israel at the temple, from the Jews and the circumcised proselytes, is generally supposed to be alluded to, by the "middle wall of partition." Under the Christian dispensation, they all worshipped together, as one body, animated by one soul, and speaking by one tongue. (Notes, Col. ii. 10—23.)

V. 19—22. The Gentile believers were no longer strangers and aliens, excluded from the privileges of God's people, as foreigners are from those of native subjects: or as those from other nations, who came occasionally to worship at Jerusalem, were from the stated or resident worshippers. But they were become fellow-citizens of the heavenly Jerusalem with the most eminent saints of Israel: they belonged to the household of God, not only as servants, but as children. Nay, they were made a part of the spiritual temple, which the outward sanctuary had typified; having been builded upon the foundation, which prophets of old, and apostles of late, had laid in their doctrine, and in the scriptures; of which foundation, and of the whole superstructure, Jesus Christ himself was the chief Corner-stone, the Centre of union, the Cement and Support. Upon him the whole building, being fitly framed, according to the counsel and plan of the divine Architect, grew up to a holy temple in the Lord; being dedicated to his glory, the place of his special presence and power, in which he delighted to be worshipped. Thus, by the continual conversion of sinners, and the progressive sanctification of believers, while each individual, in his proper place, conduces to the stability and proportion of the whole, and is himself consecrated and preserved by being a part of it, the spiritual temple is erecting from age to age, and will be, till its full completion in heaven.—So that the Gentiles, being in Christ by faith, were builded on this Foundation laid by prophets and apostles, whose predictions and doctrine related to the chief Corner-stone. Thus they became a part of the temple, together with Jewish believers; for the special in-dwelling of God, who by his Holy Spirit reigned in them, communicated his peculiar blessings, and was glorified by them. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—3.

We cannot duly value the Gospel, unless convinced that we are in ourselves dead in trespasses and sins; and that we must have perished if God had left us, as he most justly might have done. Yet, when we had neither title to happiness, nor capacity for it; when we were unable to help ourselves, and unwilling to try, we were utterly insensible of our danger, ready to vindicate our conduct, and perhaps proud of our wisdom, strength, and goodness! This is still the case with the multitudes, "who "walk according to the course of this world," in the broad way of destruction; for they, who go with the stream, who will be in the fashion and live in pleasure, "are dead whilst they live." They seek liberty in the bondage of Satan; and that "prince of the power of the air" illudes his numerous votaries with gay phantoms of fancied good, and enables them to build magnificent palaces in his unsubstantial element, that they may neglect "the gift of God, which is eternal life." Thus millions copy his example of rebellion, and do as he would have them. He still "works in the hearts of the children "of disobedience:" he prompts his ministers of unrighteousness and infidelity: and while he emboldens them to deride the doctrine of Scripture, concerning divine influences, and the agency of good and evil spirits, he must feel a horrid pleasure, mingled with contempt of the folly of those, who are thus deluded by his deceptions.—There is no doubt a black inspiration; and Satan and his angels, working on men's pride, enmity, and love of sin, teach them to invent, propagate, and ingeniously defend impious or infidel notions, and to excuse or palliate their ungodliness and worldly lusts. But indeed, in one way or another, we have all had our conversation among these children of disobedience, under Satan's influence, and fulfilling the desires of our carnal minds: and, on the broad ground of scripture, we may assert with confidence, that whether men have been more prone to sensual or spi-

Paul, the prisoner of Christ for the Gentiles, 1; shows, that the mystery, concerning their salvation, which was before concealed, had been made known to him by revelation, 2—7; and to him was this grace given, that he should preach the unsearchable riches of Christ among them, 8, 9; that the principalities and powers in heavenly places might in the church discover the manifold wisdom of God; while, according to his eternal purpose, Jews and Gentiles had access to him with boldness by Jesus Christ, 10—12. He desires that the Ephesians may not faint, because of his tribulations for them, 13; fervently prays, that they may be abundantly strengthened, enlightened, sanctified, and comforted, 14—20; and concludes with animated praises, 21.

ritual wickedness, all are alike by nature the children of wrath: that they who oppose this humbling tenet are yet dead in sin; and that the state of those who know nothing of this in their own experience is very doubtful.

V. 4—10.

In proportion as we judge of ourselves as lost sinners, so will be our apprehensions of Christ and his salvation: the more fully we perceive our guilt and pollution, the greater will be our astonishment in contemplating the immensity of the love, and the rich mercy of our God: and we shall not only allow the gift of Christ, of pardon, and of eternal life, to be most free; but we shall ascribe the change, which we have experienced in conversion, to the abundant love of God to us, even when we were dead in sin. By his power we were quickened together with Christ: he taught us to aspire to an inheritance in the heavenly places, with our risen and ascended Redeemer: and the same considerations, which will excite the admiration, and be the delightful theme, of all holy creatures, throughout a blessed eternity, will now lead us to adore the exceeding riches of the grace of God, in his kindness to us hitherto. When we reflect on the infinite majesty of God, the immensity of the creation, the meanness and wretchedness of man, and the stupendous plan of redemption, we shall not be able to account for such favour shown to us, except we also consider, that the exceeding riches of divine grace will be proportionably displayed and glorified, in the view of the whole creation, on account of each of these circumstances, and of many others, to eternal ages. "We are then saved by grace, through "faith, and that not of ourselves; it is the gift of God:" for if it had been at all of works, or man could in any respect have boasted, the glory of God had not been complete. Yet, let none infer that this is an unholy salvation: for all, who partake of it, are "God's workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works;" and his purpose and efficacious operation concur in securing the holiness of true believers. So that none can, on the ground of scripture, either abuse the doctrine to licentiousness, or accuse it of that tendency; and all who attempt either of these things are "left without excuse."

V. 11—22.

Besides the general ruined state of all men, every one of us should recollect those peculiarities of situation, character, and disposition, which set us at a greater distance from salvation than others of our fellow sinners.—The immoral and licentious conduct of some; the impiety infidelity, or dangerous heresies of others; the pharisaical pride of many; an utter disregard to religion, and ignorance of even its forms and first principles, with various other circumstances; had rendered the case of some persons peculiarly perilous, and should increase their humility and gratitude, if at length they have been converted. Many of us were once without the external knowledge of Christ, at a distance from the profession of his Gospel, strangers to the covenants of promise; having no thought about future happiness, or hope of it, and living as atheists in the world. These things should be brought into the account, in order to increase our love and zealous obedience, if we, who once were so "very far off, are "brought nigh by the blood of Christ." Through this great Peace-maker, how near may the chief of sinners approach to a reconciled God! How harmoniously then should believers live together, as members of one body and children of one family! May his grace reconcile all, who profess his truth, to God, and to each other! May every partition-wall be pulled down, and every enmity slain, which prevents the complete union of Christians, as one new Man in Christ! May he go with his ministers to the ends of the earth, "preaching peace to those that are afar off!" May his Gospel be more successfully dispensed among those that are nigh! May sinners every where seek and find access to the Father, through the Son, and by the Holy Spirit! If we are experimentally acquainted with this way of access to our reconciled God, we are no more strangers and foreigners, whatever once we were; but fellow citizens of the saints and of the household of God. We have no "law of commandments contained in ordinances," to keep us in bondage, to drive us to a distance, or to excite enmity among brethren; except such as are of human invention. Christ's institutions, (as well as his moral precepts,) are suited to help our approach to God, and our walk with him, to excite our holy affections, and to conduce to our peace with one another, when properly understood and attended on. Sinners, in these far distant regions, now hear Christ preaching peace to them, and are invited to seek access to God through him: but believers are built upon the foundation of the prophets and apostles, Jesus Christ being the chief Corner-stone, that they may be "an habitation of God through the Spirit." Let us then inquire, whether we are builded on this Foundation?

Whether our hopes are fixed on Christ, according to the doctrine of his word? Whether we have devoted ourselves as a holy temple to God through him? Whether we are an habitation of God by the Spirit? Are spiritually minded, and bring forth the fruits of the Spirit? If this is our experience and privilege, let us take care not to defile the temple of God, nor to grieve our holy Comforter; let us desire his gracious presence with us, and his influences on our hearts; let us endeavour to fill up the place assigned us, to the glory of God; and let us study to promote the peace and purity of the holy temple to which we belong, and to forward that work, by which it is continually approaching towards its full perfection.

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1—7. Some expositors suppose, that all between this first verse and the beginning of the next chapter is a kind of parenthesis; but it seems more obvious to render the sentence, "For this cause I Paul am "the prisoner of Jesus Christ;" according to the opinion of the majority of commentators. His zealous preaching to the Gentiles, and openly admitting them into the Christian Church, without circumcision, or observance of the ritual law, which implied the abrogation of the Mosaic dispensation, had so irritated the Jews, that they had apprehended him at Jerusalem; in consequence of which he was at this time a prisoner at Rome, in the cause of Christ, and for the sake of the Gentiles. As he was therefore the prisoner of Christ for them, they ought to read his epistle with peculiar attention. Since they had heard of the manner in which he had been converted, and intrusted with a dispensation to preach the Gospel of the grace of God, as the apostle of the Gentiles; and how Christ, by immediate revelation, had made known to him the mystery of his love; as he had briefly written to them in the preceding chapters, on an attentive perusal of which they would readily perceive his extensive knowledge of the mystery of Christ, in which some thought him defective. This had not in former ages been made known to mankind with that clearness, with which it was at length revealed to the holy apostles and prophets of Christ by the Holy Spirit: especially it had not been understood, that the Gentiles, without being proselyted to the Mosaic law, should be admitted to be fellow-heirs with the Jews of their covenanted blessings, forming with them one mystical body, on embracing the Gospel. Of this new dispensation Paul had been made a minister; having received the gratuitous pardon of his own sins, and abundant mercy and favour from God; and having been effectually changed by the powerful operation of his Spirit, and qualified for that important service. They, who had statedly attended on the ministry of the apostle, during his residence at Ephesus, must often have heard from him, concerning "the dispensation of the grace of God which "was given to him," in behalf of the Gentiles, (2:) but numbers, out of the adjacent regions, coming to Ephesus, heard the Gospel from him; many of whom, it is highly probable, returning home, both professed and preached it; and these might need more full information on this subject, which was so peculiarly interesting to the Gentiles. St. Peter was sent to Cornelius the first Gentile convert: but it does not appear that the whole design of God, respecting the union of uncircumcised Gentiles, (when converted to Christianity,) in one Church with Jewish believers, was so clearly revealed to him, as it was soon after to St. Paul. At least the latter, with his coadjutors, proclaimed this doctrine, so encouraging to the Gentiles and offensive to the Jews, far more avowedly, and to immensely greater numbers, than any other of the apostles, of whom we read. Some imagine that the apostle meant to show, that the value of the Christian revelation was vastly greater than that of the curious books which the Ephesians had burned, (Acts xix. 19;) and than the mysteries of the initiated in the worship of Diana. But if the former were indeed the oracles of Satan, and the latter probably little better, we can hardly conceive that the apostle would disgrace the oracles of God by such a comparison. The same may fairly be said of several other comparisons, which learned men suppose the apostle to have intended. The great mystery, here spoken of, seems very improperly confined, by many expositors, to the calling of the Gentiles, whereas the mysterious salvation, by Emmanuel's righteousness and atonement, through faith, and by the new creation of his Spirit unto holiness, which the Gentiles were called to partake of in common with the Jews, and on which the apostle had before enlarged, and to which he was about to return, (9.) was also evidently intended. The former, as exclusive, is at best but a meagre interpretation; the latter perfectly agrees with the apostle's manner, when speaking of a subject with which his heart was full.

V. 8. The apostle here formed a new word, to express the deep sense which he had of his own unworthiness: this is very properly rendered "less than the least; as it is a comparative formed from the superlative degree of the Greek adjective, signifying little. He does not seem merely to have adverted to his former persecuting enmity. That indeed made him deem himself "the "chief of sinners;" but here he spake of himself as a saint, though most mean, and unworthy of that title. In general we must ascribe this to his unaffected humility, his self-knowledge, acquaintance with the holy law, near communion with God, and candour towards his brethren: and perhaps those humiliating infirmities, of which he repeatedly spake, were in some degree taken into the account. But the consideration of his peculiarly aggravated crimes before conversion, and the unparalleled mercy and favour that had been shown him, gave him such a sense of his immense obligations, and of the returns of love, gratitude, zeal, and holiness, which became him, that he regarded his attainments and experience much more beneath the proper standard, than those of any other true Christian. Surely, thought he, no other believer loves the Lord, in a degree so disproportioned to his obligations, as I do! All his obedience, labours, usefulness, and even sufferings, would be considered as so many additional favours bestowed on him: and that coldness of affection, or rising of evil in the heart, which he could bear with in others, he deemed inexcusable in himself! This did not, however, lead him to doubt of his being a saint; but only to stand more amazed at the love of the Lord towards him; and under this impression he uttered the feelings of his heart in such energetic language, as but few can use with propriety or sincerity: though many employ the words rather as expressive of what they ought to mean, than of what they really feel concerning themselves; and some perhaps as affecting the praise of humility. On so great a sinner and so unworthy a believer was this astonishing grace conferred that he should be employed as an apostle, to preach among the idolatrous Gentiles, through many nations, the unsearchable riches of Christ! The vastness of the divine Redeemer's condescension and mercy; the preciousness of his blood and salvation; the fulness laid up in him, and the freeness with which it was bestowed; the privileges of his people, and their glorious inheritance; those riches of Christ, which were not provided for himself or for holy creatures, but purchased for the vilest of sinners; for the payment of their debts, the ransom of their souls, and the enriching of them to all eternity; which sufficed for all the multitudes that ever had come, or should come to him for them, how many soever they were; which never could be exhausted or diminished, by the most liberal and profuse communication of them, or leave the glorious and gracious Proprietor less rich than before, to the ages of eternity: these are "the unsearchable riches of Christ;" and they baffle even the powers of computation; they are incomprehensible and infinite! This was the great subject of the apostle's ministry among the Gentiles, whom he called to come and partake of these unsearchable riches by faith in Christ. It may be very useful to compare the animated language of this chapter with the cold reasonings of modern theologians, and their extreme caution lest they should speak too highly of Christ and his salvation.

V. 9—12. This preaching was appointed, that men of all nations and descriptions might perceive the happy fellowship or partnership, (so to speak,) of Jews and Gentiles in the blessings of salvation; according to the mysterious plan, which had been formed from the beginning, in the counsels of God, but had been hid from his creatures in general; save as he had given some previous intimation of it by his prophets, and had at length more fully discovered it by Jesus Christ, by whom, as the eternal Word, he at first created all things, and was now effecting a glorious new creation. (Note, John i. 1—4.) To the intent that angels and archangels, even the principalities and powers who were around his throne in heavenly places, and had from the beginning witnessed and adored the displays of his wisdom, in the works of creation and providence, should now discover still more surprising and beautifully varied displays of it, in his Church of redeemed sinners: while they beheld rebels changed into spiritual worshippers; all the Persons and perfections of the Godhead more abundantly glorified, even by means of man's apostacy; Satan's devices turned against him, and the most discordant characters united in one loving family, or as one Body in Christ. All this accorded to the purpose of God, which from eternity he had conceived in his infinite mind, of saving sinners by Christ Jesus our Lord. Through faith in him, and an interest in his salvation, both Jewish and Gentile believers had obtained the privilege of coming before God with a humble boldness, notwithstanding their reverence of his infinite majesty and purity; and with a confidence of being accepted, and receiving abundant blessings, notwithstanding their conscious guilt and pollution.

V. 13. As so great honour redounded to God, and such blessings were conferred on men, through the preaching of the Gospel to the Gentiles, the apostle was well satisfied with his sufferings on that account, and desired the Ephesians not to be discouraged, or to turn aside from their profession, on account of them; either for fear of being exposed to similar persecutions from the Jews; or through the insinuations of Judaizing teachers, who might attempt to prove that Paul had done wrong in disregarding the legal ceremonies, and thus had needlessly exposed himself to persecution. Whereas his constant and patient endurance of such sufferings, in defence of the liberty of the Gentile churches, was indeed an honour to them; it manifested the importance of their cause in his judgment, and it showed the temper of the bigoted Jews: it should therefore animate the Gentile converts to stand fast in the liberty of the Gospel.

V. 14—19. The apostle could not go, as formerly, to establish the churches by his personal exhortations; but his affectionate desire of their prosperity was unabated; so that, in his imprisonment, he bowed his knees, in constant prayer for them, unto the Father of our Lord Jesus; of whom the whole family of believers on earth, and saints and angels in heaven, are named and considered as the children of God, being gathered together in one in Christ. (i. 10.) To this Father of Christ and of the whole family the apostle prayed, that according to the riches of his mercy, which were emphatically "his glory," he would grant the Ephesians to be powerfully strengthened by his Holy Spirit, in all the holy dispositions of their renewed souls, in faith, reverential fear, love, gratitude, hatred of sin, hope, patience; that thus they might be steadfast amidst temptations and persecutions, enjoy comfort, and glorify God in every situation and duty. That Christ, being welcomed to their hearts by faith, to be their Lord and Saviour, might dwell there, as the Sovereign of all their affections and actions, and the Source of all their joys: that so they might be rooted, as a tree in a deep and fertile soil, and established, as a building on a firm foundation, by their supreme love to Christ, and his salvation, cause, and people; and thus be secured from turning aside or growing negligent, and be rendered stable and fruitful in their profession. That they might also be enabled to apprehend and understand, as all true saints did in some measure, the vastness of the love of Christ to his people. This had in it a breadth, commensurate with the boundaries of the earth, as it extended to sinners of every nation and character; a length equal to the duration of the world, yea, extending from eternity to eternity; and a depth and height, which might be contemplated in the abject state of deserved wretchedness in which Christ viewed sinners, from the height of his essential glory, the depth of suffering and abasement to which he stooped for their salvation, and the height of present privilege and future felicity to which he advanced them. In short, the apostle prayed, that they might, spiritually and experimentally, know more of the love of Christ: which passed the knowledge of all created beings, and could never be fully understood, being in all respects infinite and incomprehensible; that they might be so filled with heavenly knowledge, holy affections, and consolations, as to leave no room in their souls for error, ignorance, sin, or infelicity; but that the fulness of the divine power, grace, light, love, and joy, might wholly occupy their hearts; and that their powers might be so enlarged, as to receive more and more of these, till they should be filled with, (or unto,) all the fulness of God, as his temple was with his glorious presence. "The whole family in heaven and "earth," may include all holy creatures; but certainly none of the obstinate enemies of God. Perhaps the redeemed from among men are exclusively meant; and Christ, as the immediate antecedent, is He, from whom this family is named Christian. (Marg. Ref.) "The "height, &c." is here explained, as if necessarily connected with "the love of Christ," mentioned in the following verse. But the glorious plan of redemption in general may be meant: this, however, does not materially alter the sense.

CHAP. IV.

The apostle exhorts the Ephesians to a consistent walk, in humility and love, as united by manifold endearing bonds, 1—6: to a peaceful improvement of gifts, and performance of duties, for the good of the church; from regard to the ascended Saviour, and the nature of his communications and appointments, for the edification of his saints, 7—16: to a conduct peculiarly distinguished from that of the Gentiles around them; being taught by Christ, dead to sin, and renewed to the divine image, 17—24: to avoid deceit and anger, 25—27; to labour in what was good, and so to shun dishonesty, and to practise charity, 28; to use their tongues in holy discourse, and not in unholy, 29; to beware of grieving the Holy Spirit, 30; and to practise meekness and kindness, after the example of the love of God in Christ, 31, 32.

V. 20, 21. The apostle added to his most enlarged petitions an act of adoration, suited still more to exalt the expectations of the reader. He ascribed glory to God, as able, not only to do all that he had asked, but above all, abundantly above all, exceedingly abundantly above all, not only that he or the Ephesians had asked, but even all that they had thought, desired, or imagined! So that they might stretch their thoughts, enlarge their desires, and multiply their most comprehensive petitions, to the utmost; yet they never could reach the whole of what God was able to bestow upon them, or what he honourably could do for them in Christ Jesus. Nay, all that yet remained to be done, in order to complete their felicity and glory in soul and body, only accorded to that power, which had effected their redemption from the dominion of Satan, and their new creation to holiness; and which still upheld, preserved, and renewed them, amidst all their temptations and trials. To this God of power and grace unspeakable, the apostle most earnestly desired that glory, adoration and praise, should continually be rendered, in every part of the Church, by Christ Jesus, throughout all the ages of time, and to all eternity: and he closed this most rapturous act of devotion, by affixing his AMEN to these his prayers and praises. In attempting to explain such portions of scripture, it is almost impossible to avoid comparative flatness and insipidity; an inspired writer alone could do justice to them.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12.

Should we be called to suffer even unto bonds, in the cause of truth, and as the prisoners of Christ, we may hope to endure the cross with that cheerfulness and satisfaction, which holy Paul expressed; but our feelings would be very different, if we should suffer as evil-doers, or as "busy-bodies in other men's matters." This should teach Christians in general, and ministers especially, to confine themselves to their proper employment, to which the dispensations of Providence and of divine grace have called them; and to seek continual instructions from the Lord, both as to the mysteries of the Gospel, and the path of duty: that so their profiting in the knowledge of Christ, and their fitness for the office assigned them, may be evident to all men. We enjoy vast advantages for these studies, as the mysteries of redeeming love were not made known, even to ancient prophets, so clearly as they now are to those believers in general, who are well acquainted with the word of God: and our encouragement is proportionably great, as we sinners of the Gentiles are fellow-heirs with the ancient people of God in all the promised blessings, if we indeed are in Christ by believing the Gospel. The gift of the grace of God, and the effectual working of his power, are necessary to form a poor sinner into a faithful minister; and deep humility, united with exalted thoughts of Christ and his unsearchable riches, are invariable characteristics of those, who are thus appointed to this sacred service. Indeed, when we consider our own sinfulness by nature and practice, and contrast the poverty of our attainments, the coldness of our affections, and the manifold defilements of our conduct, with our obligations, and opportunities, and the glorious theme on which we are to insist, we may well tremble at the thoughts of preaching in the name of so holy and exalted a Saviour, even to the meanest of our fellow-rebels. But those "unsearchable riches of Christ," which we would recommend to others, may give ample encouragement to our own hearts; and our deepest humiliation will not abate our confidence of hope, if we duly advert to the power and love of our Redeemer. His riches are as unsearchable as ever: we should therefore invite the chief of sinners to leave their gilded joys, and glittering indigence, to come and be enriched by Christ. We should desire that all men might know the blessedness of the communion of the saints with God, and with each other, through the mystery of the Person and mediation of Emmanuel, by whom all worlds were created, and our souls were redeemed; and by the communion of the Holy Spirit. While angels adore the manifold wisdom of God, in his church of ransomed sinners, the ignorance of self-wise and carnal men concludes the whole design to be foolishness! But sinners, who by faith are admitted to share those blessings, "according "to the eternal purpose of God," in Christ, behold some glimpses of this glory, and are here prepared for the adorations of heaven. With humble boldness and reverential confidence, they are taught to approach the throne of grace by the faith of Christ: and thus they receive such supports and consolations, as keep them from fainting, on account of those tribulations which Satan and wicked men employ to discourage them.

V. 13—21.

will fear lest others should faint on account of those trials, which are indeed their glory. The instructions and admonitions of ministers or others should always be watered, as it were, with fervent prayers: and we may serve our brethren or relatives in this way, when precluded from all other methods. While therefore we "bow our knees "before the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," as the Father of his whole family in heaven and earth, we should not fail to supplicate him in behalf of others in every part of the world; remembering the riches of his glory, and entreating him to deal with us and with them according to it. Nor can we do better than often to enlarge on the petitions before us, whether we are praying for ourselves, or our fellow-christians. We should desire that the Lord would grant unto us, that we may be "strengthened with might "by his Spirit" in all the graces of the new man; that our hearts may be made the throne and temple of the Lord Jesus; that, in the daily exercise of faith, we may realize his gracious presence, experience his sanctifying consolations, and become more entirely devoted to his service; that, being rooted and grounded in love to him and his cause, we may be made fruitful in every good work, and bold in professing our faith in him; that thus we may understand, experience, and enjoy more and more of his boundless love, which passeth all comprehension, and will be more and more discovered and adored to all eternity; and that so at length we may be filled with all the fulness of God. In asking for such enlarged blessings, for ourselves and for all our brethren, we should not be straitened in our own minds, as we are not in our gracious God. He is "able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we" ever yet asked or thought, or ever shall be able to ask or think, as long as we live: let us then enlarge our expectations and multiply our supplications; encouraged by what he hath already done for his Church, and by his regenerating and upholding of our souls: being assured that the conversion of sinners, and the increasing light, holiness, and comfort of believers, will redound, in more abundant adorations and thanksgivings, to his glory by Christ Jesus, in his whole Church, and through all the ages of eternity. Amen, So be it. Let thy name, O Lord, be thus hallowed on earth, as it is, and ever shall be, in thy holy habitation above!

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1—6. The apostle, as the prisoner of Christ, for preaching the Gospel to the Gentiles, exhorted and entreated his Ephesian brethren, whose best interests evidently lay near his heart, that they would be very careful, that their habitual conduct in the world, and among themselves, might be worthy of their high vocation. The privileges and prospects, to which the free grace of God had called them, from a state of wretched idolatry, the obligations conferred on them, the motives and encouragements afforded them, and every thing in the doctrine and love of Christ, as well as the nature of their future inheritance, required of them a peculiar temper and conduct; which he was about to point out to them in various particulars. Especially, he must exhort them to behave with humility and self-abasement, without self-preference, boasting, emulation, or contempt of others; and with meekness, gentleness, and long-suffering, amidst great insults and injuries; as well as with a disposition to forbear with one another in love, as to those light occasions of offence or displeasure which could not be wholly avoided, even among believers, in this present imperfect state. Thus they ought, studiously and diligently, to follow after peace and harmony with each other, according to the teaching and influences of the Holy Spirit; whose in-dwelling in all their hearts was the cause of their unity as Christians, and should induce them to live together as bound in the closest amity, and the nearest of all relations, notwithstanding difference of sentiment in subordinate matters, and the manifold defects to be discerned in each other. For, in truth, the whole Church was one Body, of which every believer was a member, and Christ the Head: this Body was animated, as it were, by one life or soul, even the omnipresent Spirit of Christ: all believers were called to hope for the same eternal happiness, on the same ground of the word of God, warranted by the same experience of his converting grace. They had all one Lord, Ruler, Protector, and Judge, under whom they had their several employments allotted to them. They had all one faith, both as to its Object, Author, nature, and efficacy; and they all believed the same doctrines in the great essentials of religion. They had all been admitted into the Church by one baptism with water, "in "the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy "Spirit," as the sign of regeneration and the outward seal of the new covenant: and they were all, whether Jews or Gentiles, become the worshippers of one God, even the Father of all; who was infinitely above, and absolute Ruler over all creatures; who pervaded, sustained, and acted by all as his instruments; and who was indeed in them all, 7 ¶ But [r] unto every one of us is given [s] grace, according to [t] the measure of the gift of Christ.

8 Wherefore he saith, [u] When he ascended up on high, [x] he led * captivity captive, [y] and gave gifts unto men.

9 (Now that [z] he ascended, what is it but that [a] he also descended, first into [b] the lower parts of the earth?

through Christ, and by his Spirit, being personally distinct from the Son, and the Holy Ghost, yet mysteriously one with them. Thus they had every possible motive to live in love and peace, as being united in so many important and endearing particulars. All divisions and discords, in these circumstances, must be peculiarly incongruous; yet pride, self-wisdom, self-will, ambition, resentment, the devices of false brethren, and the stratagems of Satan, would tend to disunion; and it would require their most prudent and strenuous endeavours to "keep the unity of the Spirit in "the bond of peace." 'It must be owned, as a certain 'truth, that nothing can unite us to that Church and Body, 'of which Christ is the Head, but the participation of the 'Spirit.' (Whitby.)

V. 7—10. The common Head and Lord of this one Body had conferred on every individual member gifts and grace, according to that measure by which, in his sovereign wisdom, he proportioned his communications to the wants and circumstances of his saints. This, therefore, every one ought thankfully to receive, and quietly to employ for the benefit of the whole, without envying, coveting, or disputing. With reference to this matter, the Lord had spoken by the Psalmist concerning the victories and exaltation of the Messiah; that when he ascended up on high, and led captive those enemies who had enslaved the human race, he received gifts for rebellious men, that he might confer them on them. (Note, Ps. lxviii. 18.) Now if JEHOVAH, (who was there evidently spoken of,) ascended, what doth this imply, but that he previously descended into these lower parts of the earth? So that his incarnation, abasement, death, and burial, in human nature, previous to his resurrection and ascension, were evidently pointed out by the prophet. He, who thus descended and abased himself, was the very same Person who also ascended up far above all heavens, as placed over all the inhabitants of them; that he might fulfil all things relative to his mediatorial undertaking; that from his fulness he might fill his Church, his ministers, and all believers, with his abundant gifts and graces; and that he might fill heaven and earth with his glory. (Note, i. 22, 23.)

V. 11—13. Christ, being thus exalted, first qualified and endowed with the Holy Spirit his chosen apostles, as his invaluable gifts to men; that, through their ministry, and by the laying on of their hands, sinners might be partakers of his salvation, and of abundant spiritual gifts and miraculous powers: and that, from them, as the grand repository, the Church, in all future ages, might receive all divine truth; especially by those sacred writings, which were penned by them, and under their inspection, to be the standard of Christianity. He next qualified and raised up prophets, or extraordinary teachers endued with the gift of prophecy, and acting in subordination to the apostles, in spreading his Gospel; others he qualified to be evangelists, to preach the Gospel from city to city, as assistants to the apostles, and as observing their directions. He also qualified and appointed stated pastors and teachers in the different churches, to carry on the work begun by the apostles and evangelists. Thus the ascended Saviour, by sending forth able and faithful ministers, gave gifts unto men, as through their labours he communicated all other spiritual blessings. This appointment was intended for the perfecting of the saints in knowledge and holiness, as well as for completing their numbers, by the performance of the several parts of the ministerial work; or for the perfecting of other holy persons, to perform in their turn the work of the ministry for edifying or building up the spiritual temple; by bringing sinners through faith to be built on the true Foundation; and by increasing the fitness of believers for their several stations in the Church; in order to the beauty, harmony, and proportion of the whole. Or, considering the Church as the Body of Christ, it was intended to nourish and mature that Body, till all believers were brought to that unity of faith and agreement in doctrine, and that spiritual and experimental knowledge of the Son of God, in his Person, glory, and salvation. producing love, confidence, obedience, and conformity, which would render the whole "a perfect man," complete in every member, sense, and organ, and all grown up to maturity; according to that measure of capacity, gifts, and grace, which Christ allotted to every individual, in order to the proportion of the stature of his mystical Body, "the fulness of him who filleth all in all." That so, the Church on earth might, in each successive generation, bear some proportion to the whole assembled company when perfected in number, knowledge, holiness, union, and felicity, in heaven. Evangelists. 'Under this name 'they are to be understood, whom the apostles used as

14 That we henceforth be [q] no more children, [r] tossed to and fro, and [s] carried about by every wind of doctrine, [t] by the sleight of men, and cunning craftiness, whereby they [u] lie in wait to deceive;

15 [x] But [*] speaking the truth in love, [y] may grow up into him in all things, [z] which is the Head, even Christ:

16 From [a] whom the whole Body [b] fitly joined together, and compacted by that which every joint supplieth, according to [c] the effectual working in the measure of every part, maketh increase of the Body unto the [d] edifying of itself in love.

‘their attendants in performing their office, because they were not sufficient for every thing. Of this kind were Timothy, Titus, Silvanus, Apollos, whom Paul joined with himself in the inscription of the epistles, yet so as to call himself alone an apostle. This office therefore was only temporary.’ (Beza.) The opinion of this venerable Reformer, in the last clause, perhaps is not well founded. The office of Evangelists seems to have been, in most respects, similar to that of missionaries in subsequent times; that is, preachers of the Gospel, without full apostolical authority, and without any stated charge, going among the heathen to found churches, under the personal direction of the apostles while they lived, and afterwards according to their doctrine and methods of proceeding, or visiting the churches already planted, to set in order such things as were wanting to supply the deficiencies, or aid the labours of stated pastors, and to stimulate them to greater earnestness in discharging their duty. When zeal for propagating the Gospel subsided, this office sunk into disuse; and thus for ages the heathen have been, in a great measure, neglected; but in one form or another, the office of evangelist, or something of the same nature, must revive with the spirit of evangelizing the nations.—‘These, when they, (the persons above-mentioned,) were employed in preaching the Gospel to those who had not yet received it, the Scripture calls Evangelists.’ (Hammond.) It might have previously been expected, in the present divided state of the Church, that the zealots of each division would find out their own plan of Church-government, and their own orders of ministers, exclusively in this passage; but it is probable that none of them would be satisfied with so general a statement, were they called to write their sentiments on the subject.

V. 14—16. This whole plan was formed in order that believers should not thenceforth be, as many had been, like children in knowledge and experience; and so, through instability, want of judgment, and weakness of faith, liable to be tossed to and fro, as ships without ballast, by the waves of the sea; or carried about like clouds with the wind. by the false and pernicious doctrines which subtle and ingenious men devised; and by the plausible reasonings and pretences with which they propagated them; as in this manner Satan's ministers waited by the way for the professors of the Gospel, to deceive and pervert them for their own ambitious and selfish purposes. To prevent the division, scandals, and delusions, arising from the cunning craftiness of such deceivers, and the unsuspecting credulity of weak Christians, apostles, prophets, evangelists, and teachers, had been appointed; and every believer had his measure of spiritual gifts bestowed on him, that he might improve it to promote the purity, peace, and edification of the Church. Thus all Christians, as well as ministers, being taught to hold, or maintain, the truth in love, uprightly professing and defending the great truths of the Gospel in meekness towards all men, and love of each other, might grow up in all things to a nearer communion with Christ, and conformity to him, by influence derived from him, and by observing his directions, as members in that Body of which he is the Head, from whom the whole receives all its life, vigour, and spiritual health. And being fitly proportioned and closely united, through the gifts, grace, and services of each individual, and with the effectual operation of Christ by his Spirit, according to his appointed measure in every part, continual increase might be made to it, both by the conversion of sinners and the sanctification of believers; and the whole be edified, united, adorned, and advanced, in love of Christ, and of every one to the other, with all the happy effects and fruits of love. In this respect the Church would resemble the human body, which consists of various members, united by joints and ligaments; each part being proportioned to its place, and fitted for its use: the whole being compacted by the nerves, arteries, veins, and the circulations continually carrying on from the head and the heart, through every part of the whole. Thus it grows up from infancy to manhood, and is preserved in vigour and activity, while every part performs its proper function in union with the head, in perfect harmony with all the rest, and for the common good. This shows the intent, tendency, and duties of the several stations of Christians in the Church; and if these were more attended to, the resemblance would be more manifest, and the effects unspeakably beneficial. (Notes, 1 Cor. xii.)

V. 17—20. In order that the Ephesians might "by "love serve one another," the apostle next called on them, not only as a friendly monitor, but as testifying to them, and charging them in the name and by the authority of the Lord Jesus, that they should not thenceforth, after having professed the Gospel, conduct themselves in the same manner that the unconverted Gentiles did; but should manifest such a distinction of temper and behaviour as became their vocation. For the Gentiles around them walked "in the vanity of their mind;" and their vain speculations and carnal affections concurred in influencing them to choose and pursue worldly vanities as their chief good, which was the natural effect of their vain idolatry. Their understandings were darkened through pride, prejudices, and lusts, and by the agency of Satan; so that they were wholly averse to that life of spiritual obedience which God requires and communicates, which accords to his own nature and felicity, and which is the beginning and preparation for heavenly joys. This "alienation from "the life of God," was the effect of their gross ignorance in every thing relating to true religion; and that arose, not so much for want of capacity or means of information, as from the blindness or hardness, of their hearts, and the obstinate depravity of their affections. Thus they stupified themselves with false principles, corrupting fables, and habitual excesses, till they lost all feeling of conscience, and sense of propriety, decency, and morality; and so gave themselves up to the unrestrained indulgence of their lewd inclinations, by the greedy commission of the most unnatural and detestable uncleanness; as if their highest happiness had consisted in these far worse than brutal practices. (Notes, Rom. i. 18—32.) Greediness. The original is covetousness. 'All this they did with 'covetousness, while they were never satisfied with luxurious indulgence, neither had their voluptuousness any 'measure or bounds.' (Jerom.)

V. 21—24. The Ephesians had not so learned that religion, of which Christ is both the Teacher and the lesson, the centre of all doctrines, promises, ordinances, and duties, as to live after the manner of their heathen neighbours. Indeed, some in other places had learned Christ from teachers who paid little regard to their practice; but they had been better instructed, seeing they had heard Christ himself, as it were, speak by his apostle, and had been thus taught by him as the "truth was in Jesus," laid up in him as in a treasury, to be communicated from him to his Church, through his word and ordinances; or, if so be they had been taught by him, that is, by his Spirit as well as by his ministers. For indeed, "the truth as it was in Jesus," taught men, that they must put off, in respect of their whole former conversation and behaviour, the "old man," or that sinful nature which they derived from fallen Adam, and which is corrupt in all its principles and affections, according to those various inordinate desires of worldly things, which mock men's expectations, deceive their souls, and make them deceivers of each other; and which may therefore be called deceitful lusts, "lusts of deceit." The outward conduct, resulting from this corrupt nature, must be cast off at once as a filthy garment; and the inward desires themselves must be denied, crucified, and mortified, till they are wholly abolished. (Notes, Rom. vi. 5, 6.) The Ephesians had also been taught, according "to the truth in "Jesus," that they must continually be renewed more and more in the inward judgment, temper, and affections of their souls, by the power of divine grace, into the humble, spiritual, holy, and loving mind of Christ; that so they might "put on the new man," and that their habitual conduct might be conformed to his example, and evince that they were new created after the image of God, in righteousness and true holiness, the holiness of truth, that is, evangelical holiness, even that holiness which springs from a real belief of the truth as it is in Jesus, consists in uprightness towards God and man, and produces true and genuine peace and satisfaction. (Notes, &c. Gen. i. 26. Rom. xii. 1—3. xiii. 14.) These lessons they had been taught by the apostle, and by Christ himself, if they were true Christians; and, in connexion with the means, motives, and assistances afforded them, they would effectually lead them to a conduct very different from that of their Gentile neighbours. The corrupt conversation, including doubtless the bad habits of the heathen, is distinguished from "the old man," or the depraved nature whence all these evils sprang. The root would still remain after the converts had "put off, concerning the "former conversation, the old man;" and this would render watchfulness and diligence needful to the end, even till "the body of sin was abolished." If "the old man," signify only bad habits, as many explain it, how did it come to pass that these bad habits have always been so general, not to say universal, while good habits have been exceedingly rare? We never read of bad habits, in any degree, among holy angels, nor would they have been heard of among men, if we had not apostatized from God, and become dead in sin, and by nature children of wrath." The state of the unconverted Gentiles is, indeed, here particularly adverted to; yet it is most certain, that the nature of the unregenerate, (nay, their practice also, except in respect of gross idolatry and some of its abominable appendages,) is similar, even in those who are called Christians.

V. 25. Let the Ephesians show that they had put off the old man with his deeds, by laying aside every kind of lies and deceit: let them no longer flatter, slander, defraud, amuse, or compliment others, by any deviation from strict sincerity: but let every one of them speak the plain truth to his neighbours, without disguise, prevarication, simulation, or dissimulation: seeing that men, both in the Church and in civil society, were "members one of another;" and ought not in any way to deceive each other; but should think it as unnatural and preposterous to impose on one another, as for a schism to take place in the body, or for one sense or member to delude, or mislead another into mischief, to the common detriment of the whole body. ‘Dr. Whitby hath well shown, in his note on this passage, that several of the best of the heathen moralists thought lying might in many cases be justified: and I wish that none but heathens had ever taught so loose and dangerous a doctrine.’ (Doddridge.)

V. 26, 27. It would be proper to express displeasure at what was wrong, on many occasions, both in the management of their families, in reproving sin, and even in ordering their temporal concerns, so that all anger was not to be prohibited: yet let Christians be sure to restrain that dangerous passion within the bounds of reason, meekness, piety, and charity; not being angry without cause, or above cause, or in a proud, selfish, and peevish manner; not expressing their displeasure by reproaches, or furious rage, or suffering it to settle into resentment; but always endeavouring to subordinate its exercise to the glory of God, and the benefit of the offender himself, as well as that of others; and to show stronger disapprobation of the sin committed against God, than of the injury done to themselves. This would induce them to attend to the caution annexed, "not to let the sun go down upon their wrath," not to close the day without forgiving and praying for those who had offended them, or expressing a disposition to reconciliation and kindness. In this, and in other respects, they must take care not "to give place to the devil," who watched his opportunity of filling their minds with rancour and malice, and of thus exciting divisions and contentions among them. (Marg. Ref.) (Notes, Matt. v. 21—26. Mark iii. 1—5.)

V. 28. It might also be supposed, that, when the Ephesians were idolaters, they had practised various kinds of fraud and dishonesty, and that some of them had even lived by theft, rapine, or oppression. These might not, in many cases, be able to make restitution: but at least let them finally cease from every kind and degree of this vice; and, rather than do wrong to any man, let every one, however he had before lived in habits of ease and self-indulgence, learn, and submit to, if necessary, even the lowest and most laborious employment, which was honest and useful to society; not only in order to provide food and raiment for himself and family, but that he might be able to relieve the more urgent necessities of his sick and afflicted brethren and neighbours. Thus their Christian conduct would be as honourable, as their former behaviour had been disgraceful. In this way, even the grand principle of restitution, (namely, renouncing all right to property which has been injuriously acquired,) would be adhered to, as far as their circumstances admitted or it; and a fund raised, among the vigorous and healthy poor, for the relief of the sick and aged. Great stress seems in many places to be laid on this; which in a very striking manner shows to what an extent charitable communications, from the substance or gains of Christians, in every station of life, for the relief of their brethren, and of others for Christ's sake, ought to be carried. (Marg. Ref.) But, alas! they who are not eager to amass wealth, as most in these days are, spend too much on themselves and their families, to have a due proportion to spare for such purposes: and a degree of liberality, even far beneath the scriptural and primitive standard, is now deemed rather a prodigy to be wondered at, than an example to be imitated!

V. 29. The apostle furthermore exhorted his readers to abstain from all corrupt and polluting conversation, and not to suffer any thought of that contagious nature, which arose in their hearts, to proceed out of their lips; as this would poison the imaginations of the hearers, even when not so grossly indecent as to shock them. On the contrary, they ought to watch their opportunity of introducing wholesome and instructive discourse; and to take heed that the general tendency of their conversation was good, useful, and edifying; even such as might be the means of communicating grace to the hearers, by the blessing of God upon it; either by bringing careless persons to serious reflection, or by encouraging, warning, or quickening believers. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 30—32. In this, and in every other respect, Christians should beware of "grieving the Holy Spirit of God.'—'Give diligence, that the Holy Spirit may dwell in 'you willingly, as in a pleasant and agreeable habitation, 'and do not give him any cause for grief. He speaks 'here of the Spirit after the manner of men.' (Beza.) (Marg. Ref.) When a father has done every thing proper for the benefit of his son, he is grieved if his son acts in an unbecoming manner; and consequently, will not be free and cheerful in his company, but will either shun him, or frown on him. The sanctifying and comforting influences of the Holy Spirit seal believers, as the peculiar people of God, to the day of complete redemption, even to the general resurrection. (Notes, i. 13, 14. 2 Cor. i. 20—22.) (Marg. Ref.) As a kind and wise Friend, the Holy Spirit watched over the Ephesian converts for their good, with infinite condescension and love: all their hope, wisdom, strength, and joy, were from him; and the only return that he required was, a ready compliance with his holy suggestions, and a watchfulness against every thing of a contrary tendency. But, if they indulged anger, selfishness, deceit, sensual lusts, or vain conversation, he would hide his face, or frown upon them, withhold his consolations, and leave them to darkness, fears, anxieties, or even to know their own weakness by such falls, as would expose them to sharp corrections. In watching against these painful consequences, let them put away all bitterness and harshness of temper, language, and behaviour, even toward such as most grievously offended them; and avoid all sinful anger, and clamorous disputes, revilings, slanders, and reproaches, as well as all malice and resentment: that they might be kind and tenderly sympathizing with each other, and ready to forgive, even as God in Christ, and for his sake, had forgiven them.—(Notes, Matt. xviii. 21—35. 1 Cor. xiii.) None but true believers, persons really partaking of the regenerating sanctifying Spirit of Christ, could feel the energy of this exhortation: and, in the judgment of charity, the apostle addressed the Ephesians as of this happy company.—Sealed. 'That is, have God's mark set upon you, that 'you are his servants; a security to you, that you shall 'be admitted into his kingdom as such, at the day of 'redemption, that is, at the resurrection; when you 'shall be put in the actual possession of a place in his 'kingdom, among those who are his, whereof the Spirit 'is now an Earnest.' (Locke.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

The mind that was in Christ, will teach those who suffer for his sake, to be more desirous that believers should walk worthy of their vocation, than of their own exemption from the cross: and though we can do nothing towards our own justification, yet by the grace of God we may do a great deal for the honour of the Gospel and the benefit of mankind. A spiritual, humble, obedient, and holy walk, is peculiarly suitable to the character of our Saviour, and to the freeness of our holy salvation, as well as to the nature of our present privileges and future inheritance. Even the candour and allowance, which we are conscious that we need from our brethren, should teach us to act with all lowliness and meekness, with "long-suffering, forbearing one another in love." If all who profess the Gospel did indeed thus "endeavour to "keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace," what a different face would the Church of God assume! But, alas! whilst there is one Body, one Spirit, one hope, one Lord, one faith, one baptism, and one God and Father of all, on whom all depend, and from whom all our hopes and comforts come, how grievously do the remaining ignorance, bigotry, and disproportionate zeal about comparatively trifles, even in good men, the designing ambition and furious passions of bad men, and the artifices of the devil, defeat the endeavours of those who labour for peace; and perpetuate, yea multiply, divisions and dissentions among those who are agreed in the great essentials of Christianity! Let us, however, persevere in seeking, and praying for, the peace of the Church: for "blessed are the peace-makers;" and whatever eager zealots may say of them, "they shall be called the children of "God." Let us watch against spiritual pride, envy, and the ambition of popularity: and let us improve our measure of endowment, as the gift of Christ for the benefit of others, with contentment and quietness.

V. 7—16.

It may be very useful to remember, that the Redeemer first came down from heaven, and abased himself, before he ascended as a triumphant Conqueror, to enrich us rebels with the fruits of his victories. Thus he left us an example that we should follow his steps, and expect abasement, self-denial, and the cross here, and honour and felicity hereafter. While Christians should be exhorted to value the faithful ministry of the Gospel, as the precious gift of Christ, and the grand means of salvation to their souls, pastors and teachers, however distinguished, should be reminded of the end for which they were appointed, even "for the perfecting of the saints, and for the work "of the ministry," rather than for the emolument or reputation of it; and for the edification of the body of Christ, not for the indulgence of themselves or the advancement of their families. We should then "take heed to ourselves and to our doctrine," and labour to bring those among whom we minister to the unity of the faith and of the knowledge of the Son of God, and to that maturity of judgment and experience, which may fit them to be a part of that complete Body, "according to the measure of the "stature of the fulness of Christ." For by leading believers with gradual advances to this ripeness of knowledge, we most effectually counteract the sleight of men,

CHAP. V.

The apostle exhorts the Ephesians to imitate the love of God in Christ, 1, 2*: to avoid all uncleanness, covetousness, and improper discourse, which draw down the wrath of God upon "the children of disobedience,"* 3—6*; to have no fellowship with the works of darkness; but, as the children of light, to reprove them,* 7—14*; to walk with wisdom and circumspection,* 15—17*: not to drink to excess; but to be filled with the Spirit, singing Psalms and praises to God,* 18—20*: and to submit to one another, in the several relations of life,* 21. The duties of wives and husbands, enforced and illustrated, by the mutual love of Christ and his church, 22—33.

and that cunning craftiness by which they lie in wait to deceive; for their success is chiefly among unstable professors, or such Christians, as, being children in understanding, are liable to be "tossed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine," and by every subtile device of the enemy. We should indeed hold the truth with firmness, but it should also be in love; otherwise, zeal for orthodoxy may dictate such violent measures, as will more distract the Church, and injure the cause of Christ, than false teachers themselves could do. But in "faith working by love" we grow up into Christ in all things, and, acting in this spirit, every minister and Christian, as a part of that Body of which he is the Head, contributes to the proportion, union, and prosperity of the whole, according to the effectual working of Christ in every part; and thus the Church is increased in holiness and in numbers, "by edifying itself in love." Indeed, every congregation, where the truth is preached, will prosper and increase, according to the measure in which this peaceful and loving improvement of every one's talents for the common benefit is attended to; for "the fruit of righteousness is sown in peace of them that make peace, but where envying and strife are, there is confusion and every evil work."

V. 17—24.

Let all ministers testify in the Lord against antichristian tempers and practices, as well as against false doctrines, and insist upon it, that believers must not walk as others do, who are Gentiles in conduct, though Christians in name; for the difference between heretofore, and henceforth, is of vast importance in this grand concern. Alas! do not men on every side walk in the vanity of their minds? Is it not plain that their understandings are darkened, and their hearts alienated from the life of God, and even hardened against it, through the ignorance that is in them? Nay, are there not numbers who are past feeling, and have given themselves up to work all uncleanness with greediness? Must we not then insist most decidedly upon the distinction between real and nominal Christians? Indeed, there are many professors of evangelical truth who have so learned Christ, as not to be convinced of the necessity of mortifying their corrupt nature and its deceitful lusts; of being "renewed in the spirit of their minds," and of "putting on the new man, as created after God in righteousness and true holiness!" But if we have truly learned Christ, from the teaching of his word and Spirit, we shall be daily aiming to practice these lessons, seeking help from God by fervent prayer; we shall mourn that so much power yet remains in our old corrupt nature, and we shall long to be more like our divine Master, in every part of our temper and conduct.

V. 25—32.

Zealous professors, and indeed, admired preachers of evangelical truth, nay, even true Christians, need warning and cautioning to avoid immoral practices; but the latter welcome and profit by the word of exhortation, while hypocrites detect themselves by raging against it. They, who most vigilantly examine themselves, will most perceive the extreme difficulty of entire truth and sincerity in all their conversation, and of avoiding every kind and degree of falsehood; they also find it very difficult to feel and express anger on the most justifiable occasions, and to perform the duties of parents, masters, or ministers, without falling into sin and dishonouring their profession. They perceive it very necessary to watch and pray against resentment, lest "the sun should go down upon their wrath," and so place should be given for Satan to tempt them to further transgressions; for, in every thing, the occasions of his suggestions should be assiduously avoided. Nay, exact and scrupulous honesty is far more uncommon than is generally imagined; and even some pious persons do things not strictly just, for want of being instructed and admonished after the apostolical manner. But while thieves and robbers are as welcome to Christ as their more moral neighbours, yet, thenceforth they must steal no more, whatever hard labour may be necessary for an honest livelihood. What then shall we think of those professed Christians, who grow rich and live in luxury, by various frauds, oppressions, excessive profits, smuggling, and other acts of injustice, without restitution or amendment? And if the poor labourer should give to him that needeth, what shall we think of them, whose large revenues and immense expenses or hoardings are far out of all proportion to their penurious and scanty alms? Our discourse also must be kept pure, our tongues bridled, and the gift of speech improved diligently as a talent; that so we may not, with this unruly member, do mischief to others, but may speak such pious and instructive words, as are suited to minister grace to the hearers, if we would act according to our obligations as Christians. When we, in any degree or respect neglect these rules, we "grieve the Holy Spirit of God," lose our comfort and evidence, or even bring our state into doubt and suspicion. Let us then watch against all these evils, all anger and malice, and copy diligently the loving example of our God and Saviour.

BE ye therefore [a] followers of God, [b] as dear children;

NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 1, 2. Instead of the malignant passions, mentioned towards the close of the preceding chapter, the believers at Ephesus were exhorted to follow or imitate God, as his beloved children, in all his moral perfections, especially in that love from which their salvation flowed. This might best be contemplated in the Person and love of Christ, who had assumed human nature, and given himself for them an offering or sacrifice to God, which was to him a sweet-smelling savour, in allusion to the typical sacrifices that were consumed on the altar. Not that the Father took pleasure in the sufferings of his "beloved Son," in themselves; but his justice and holiness were glorified in them, and a way was thus opened for the honourable exercise of mercy towards those who deserved his awful vengeance; and in this he was well pleased.—As the Father appointed and provided this sacrifice, and from love to us gave his beloved Son for our sins, and as Jesus said "I and my Father are One;" so the love of Christ must be equivalent to that love of God, which they were directed to copy in their habitual conduct.—Compassion for the deservedly miserable, condescension to the mean and vile, a readiness to forgive injuries, self-abasement, self-denial, and enlarged beneficence, were most illustriously manifested in that love, which is here proposed as the pattern for our imitation.

V. 3, 4. The apostle had, in the foregoing chapter, warned the Ephesians against several of those immoralities, to which they had been addicted before their conversion, and he here resumes that subject. The degree, in which fornication in particular, and other kinds of licentiousness were practised, and even allowed, nay vindicated, by the gravest philosophers of the Gentiles, can hardly be conceived by those who are not very conversant with their writings. The exhortation, therefore, as it respects these vices, needs little comment; but many learned men maintain, that the word, rendered covetousness, means an insatiable craving after more and more of these sensual indulgences. Now, it cannot be denied that the word sometimes has that sense; yet it can hardly be supposed, that the apostle would, in so general a way, have added to his warning against fornication, the mention of that "uncleanness with greediness," which he had before stated as the excess of Pagan blindness and hardness of heart. (iv. 19.) On the other hand, can it be thought, that covetousness should here, and in all other exhortations of a similar nature, which the apostle addressed to the churches, be almost, if not entirely, overlooked? For they, who explain the word in this text of greediness in lewdness, put the same construction on it in other places where it occurs. No doubt, covetousness, or eager desires of gain, whether to hoard, or to support extravagance, is as contrary to vital Christianity, as the grossest sensualities, though more plausible, and not so easily defined: and also as supplying the means of silencing or softening the reproofs of those who would firmly protest against fornication, and even, in many cases, prosecute them with the censures of the Church. The clause, indeed, "let it not "once be named, &c." may only mean, 'Let it not be 'said, that a Christian is guilty of such crimes.' But if understood of the discourse, in which the naming or mentioning of licentious practices, in a manner too common, tends to pollute the imaginations, or inflame the passions of the hearers, it cannot be doubted, that the conversation of those who speak as if every thing was valuable in proportion as money can be got or saved by it, corrupts the judgment and principles of men, though in another way, yet as effectually as obscene discourse. It seems also to be with peculiar propriety, that the apostle joined this odious vice with these others more generally scandalous. Neither the one nor the other should be mentioned without detestation, for this became, (or suited their character as) saints, and their relation to God, as his children, as members of Christ, as temples of the Holy Spirit, as heirs of heaven, and as lights in the world. Nay, they must not allow of any indecent conversation, or any thing vain and trifling, or even those witty turns of expression, by which improper sentiments, being conveyed in an ingenious manner, obtain applause, instead of exciting indignation. Nothing of this kind could consist with the character of Christians, who ought rather to converse together on the mercies of God, and unite in thanksgivings for them.

V. 5--7. The apostle here supposed his readers to 8 For [y] ye were sometimes darkness, [z] but now are ye light in the Lord: [a] walk as children of light:

9 (For [b] the fruit of the Spirit is in all [c] goodness, and [d] righteousness, and [e] truth;)

11 And have [h] no fellowship with the [i] unfruitful [k] works of darkness, [l] but rather reprove them.

12 For [m] it is a shame even to speak of those things which are done of them [n] in secret.

know, that fornicators, unclean persons, and covetous men, were out of the way to heaven. The latter, though often more favoured than debauched characters, were, in the strictest sense, idolaters, seeing they loved, trusted, and expected happiness from wealth, rather than from God; and sought to increase or secure their treasures, instead of seeking first his favour, image, and glory. (Marg. Ref.) They were not therefore truly converted; and, not being subjects of Christ's kingdom on earth, they could not be entitled to the inheritance of that heavenly kingdom, which God, for Christ's sake, would bestow on all true believers. Some might indeed argue against this declaration; and, excusing such practices, or amusing themselves with speculations on God's mercy and the freeness of salvation, might persuade others that they were not absolutely inconsistent with a state of acceptance. But let none suffer any man to deceive them with vain words; as these very practices brought the wrath of God upon the children of disobedience, or those who persisted in unbelief, impenitence, and the allowed practice of sin. But vain, deceitful words of various kinds might be noticed, did our limits permit. The common principles which prevail even in countries professing Christianity, among those who are far removed from an antinomian perversion of evangelical truth, properly so called, dictate vain words, which deceive vast multitudes. A smattering of vain philosophy, united with these common notions, leads numbers to conclude, that God will not punish men for indulging their natural inclinations, however irregularly. Many popular writers, of late, have spoken of fornication, and even the seduction of an unmarried woman, as no crime; or merely as 'indulging the most amiable weakness of human nature!' In these, and in various other ways, ingenious men, and even moral philosophers, by moral essays, so called, in modern times deceive millions with vain words; and no doubt the grand deceiver of mankind had prophets of a similar stamp in ancient days. When the vilest of transgressors repent and believe the Gospel, they become "children of obedience," from whom the wrath of God is turned away; but it could not be expected that he would punish the Gentiles for such abominations, and connive at them in professed Christians. If the Ephesians therefore meant to escape the condemnation of their heathen neighbours, let them not partake of their crimes.

V. 8—14. The Ephesians had once been darkness itself, through total ignorance of God and his will; but now, by the Gospel, they were made "light in the Lord," as One with Christ, the Light of the world. Let them therefore walk as children of the Light; like persons who were born again into the spiritual world, to be trained up as heirs of the light of heaven. If they were inwardly enlightened, the Holy Spirit, by whom the change had been wrought, would lead them to a suitable conversation; as the fruit of the Spirit consisted in all kinds of goodness, mercy, equity, integrity, veracity, sincerity, and faithfulness; as well as in uprightness in their professed faith, fear, and love of God. Let them then prove, or make trial of those things, which God accepted and delighted in, and seek solid enjoyment in them. But let none of them countenance those works of darkness, from which carnal men sought pleasure and profit; but which were wholly unfruitful, and yielded no present real advantage, to counterbalance in any degree the future ruin to which they led. On the contrary, let them reprove such vices in their neighbours, by refusing to join in them, by protesting plainly against them, by showing their hateful nature and pernicious tendency; or by keeping a significant silence, when more explicit reproof might be unsuitable. For indeed it was a shame even to speak of the practices, which the heathens secretly committed; not only in taverns and brothels, but more especially in the most sacred mysteries of their abominable religion! The light, however, of divine truth, held forth in an open profession, and a suitable walk and conversation, could not fail to detect and expose the detestable nature of such shameful practices. For whatever thus tended to make things manifest according to their real nature was light, and equivalent, in the spiritual world, to the light of the Sun in the natural world. With a view to this, according to the tenour of the Old Testament prophecies, (Is. lx. 1:) the Lord now called on sinners of the Gentiles to awake from the sleep of sin, and their vain dreams of worldly happiness; yea, to arise from the death of sin; and Christ would, by his doctrine and Spirit, give them sufficient light to discover and escape every danger, and to find the way of peace and holiness. Surely, this one text ought for ever to silence the vain speculations of those, who, arguing from figurative expressions, concerning the state of sinners, as asleep, nay, dead in sin, not only object to, but absolutely condemn, as heresy, the most scriptural addresses, and calls to them to repent and turn to God, and believe in Christ, and seek salvation!

15 [s] See then that ye [t] walk circumspectly, [u] not as fools, but as wise, 16 [x] Redeeming the time, because [y] the days are evil.

17 Wherefore [z] be ye not unwise, but [a] understanding what the will of the Lord is.

18 And [b] be not drunk with wine, wherein is [c] excess; [d] but be filled with the Spirit;

19 Speaking [e] to yourselves in [f] psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs, singing and making melody [g] in your heart to the Lord;

20 Giving [h] thanks always for all things unto God and the Father, [i] in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ:

21 [k] Submitting yourselves one to another [l] in the fear of God.

V. 15–20. With these advantages, the Ephesians ought to see to it, that they walked accurately; and to consider how they should behave: or with exactness, according to the commands and example of Christ: keeping the middle way, avoiding all appearance of evil, and aiming at more complete obedience in every particular; and circumspectly, cautiously looking at their paths, to shun the snares laid in them; not acting as heedless, ignorant, or foolish persons, who rush into dangers, temptations, and mischief, but as wise men, who are aware of them and escape them. As a great part of their lives had been wasted in heathen darkness, they ought also to improve their time for the future the more diligently; redeeming or buying it off from other avocations, at the expense of much self-denial and watchfulness; that they might spend it in religious exercises, or in doing good to others according to the duties of their stations; for the days were evil, and the persecutions that awaited them might render the term of their usefulness more precarious, than in peaceful seasons: so that if they would secure their own salvation, or do good to mankind, no time was to be lost. Let them not then be as unwise servants, who were not prepared for their Lord's coming, and were ignorant of their work: nay, let them spare no pains to understand his will concerning them, that they might serve him intelligently, as well as zealously, and without giving their enemies any advantage against them. Instead of joining, or imitating the revels of their neighbours, or seeking exhilaration by intemperate drinking, which induced a temporary insanity, and various disorders both of body and mind, and led to the most ruinous and mischievous conduct, let them wait on God in every appointed means, for larger communications of the Holy Spirit, whose sacred influences would fill their souls with satisfying consolations in every circumstance, and tend to the happiest consequences in future. In order to this, they should substitute in the place of the loose odes and songs of the Gentiles, or other trifling conversation, the psalms and hymns of the sacred scripture, and such spiritual songs as pious men composed on the peculiar subjects of the Gospel, and according to the doctrine of truth. In these they should speak to themselves, or to each other; attending to the affections of their hearts; that the inward melody of holy love and gratitude unto the Lord might unite with the outward melody of poetry and singing, when they used them in this manner, either alone or in social worship. It was incumbent on them also to give thanks always, even in seasons of persecution and affliction; and for all things, not excepting such as nature disrelished, being satisfied of their beneficial tendency. Thus let them acknowledge their manifold obligations to God, even the Father, in the name of Christ, through whom alone blessings were bestowed on sinful creatures, and praises accepted from them.

V. 21. In order to glorify God and adorn the Gospel, it was requisite, that Christians should submit to one another, and to all who had authority, according to their different situations and relations in the church or the community, and the subordination established by the word or providence of God. This should be done, not so much from secular motives of propriety and expediency, as in the fear of God, and from a reverential regard to his authority, his favour, and glory; which would obviate those multiplied excuses, that might be made for the neglect of this submission, on account of the misconduct of superior relations, and on various other grounds.

28 So ought men to love their wives [d] as their own bodies: he that loveth his wife, loveth himself.

29 For no man ever yet [e] hated his own flesh; but [f] nourisheth and cherisheth it, even as the Lord the church:

30 For we [g] are members of his body, of his flesh, and of his bones.

31 For [h] this cause shall a man leave his father and mother, and shall be joined unto his wife, and they two shall be one flesh.

32 This is [i] a great mystery: but [k] I speak concerning Christ and the church.

33 Nevertheless, [l] let every one of you in particular so love his wife, even as himself; and the wife see that she [m] reverence her husband.

V. 22—27. As a most important instance of that "submission to one another in the fear of God," which had been mentioned, the apostle exhorted wives to submit themselves to their own husbands, as an essential part of their obedience to the Lord, who had appointed this subordination, and required this subjection, in all things lawful, for his own glory and the benefit of mankind. For, the husband was constituted the head of the wife, as her ruler and protector, both in Providence and by the law of God: even as Christ was the Head of the Church, and the Saviour of this his mystical body. The government of Christ and the subjection of the Church, are conducive to the benefit of the latter, as Christ's authority is that of wisdom and love: and in general it is beneficial even to the women, to be subject to their own husbands, in the same manner that the Church is subject to Christ; though the rule may seem to admit of some exceptions. But to render this submission more easy, beneficial, and comfortable; husbands also ought to love their wives, with that tender, constant, faithful, and compassionate affection, which Christ showed to the Church. He had even given up himself to the death upon the cross, in order to save his people from their sins; that, having atoned for their guilt, he might also cleanse them from their pollution, by those influences of the Holy Spirit, of which the baptismal water was the external sign; and which were communicated through the word, as the means of their conversion and progressive sanctification. (Marg. Ref.) Thus, as the heavenly Bridegroom, he prepares the whole multitude of his people, his one espoused bride, for the completion of that sacred union; that he may "present her to himself," as the object of his choice, the purchase of his blood, and the work of his grace, a glorious and glorified Church, not having one remaining spot of sin, or wrinkle of imperfection, or any thing of the kind: but made complete in holiness, without the least remaining blemish.

V. 28—31. The apostle, having described, in the most affecting manner, the effects of the love of Christ to his Church, and the subjection of the Church to his authority; here shows, that men ought to love their wives with a wise, holy, constant, and tender affection, in conformity to that perfect pattern: in every thing seeking their comfort and advantage, sympathizing in their sorrows, bearing with their infirmities, and endeavouring to promote their salvation and sanctification. They ought indeed to love them even as they do their own bodies: for so intimate and indissoluble is this endeared relation, in its original intention, and when properly entered into and attended to; that a man, in loving his wife, may be said to love himself, as her comfort and happiness are, and should be deemed, inseparable from his own. Now, no man in his senses can hate his own flesh, or take pleasure in wounding and paining it: but, self-love teaches him to nourish and cherish it; in the same manner that the Lord doth his Church, and every believer in it; all of whom he graciously considers as members of his body, and, as it were, a part of his flesh and of his bones. And thus ought men to love their wives, be tender and kind to them, and provide for their comfort. What an affecting view does this give us of Christ's love to his people! He loves, and nourishes, and cherishes them, as a man does his own body! To instruct us in these duties, the Lord, by the original institution of marriage, commanded men even to leave their parents, in order to join interests and affections with their wives, as if they became indissolubly one body, or one flesh, with them. All that was contrary to this, had been the effect of sin, and ought to be peculiarly guarded against: that so, every man should consider the wife of his choice, or rather of God's choice for him, as a part of himself, whom he cannot abuse without injuring himself, and who cannot be hurt without his sharing the harm; as if any part of his own body had been wounded.

V. 32, 33. This is indeed, says the apostle, a great mystery, I mean the union of Christ and his Church: nevertheless, to return to our subject, let every man in particular thence learn in what manner to love his wife, even as himself, and be supplied with motives so to do; and every woman to respect and honour the person and authority of the husband, as constituted her head by the law and providence of God. It is obvious, that there must, in all cases, be manifold defects and failures on both sides, in the present state of human nature; and often grievous offences may be committed: yet, this does not materially alter the duty of the other relation, (except in some cases elsewhere provided for.) (Notes, Matt. xix. 3—9. 1 Cor. vii.) Indeed, a great part of the difficulty and duty consists in persevering good behaviour, notwithstanding unsuitable returns. It is observable that the apostle says, "let every one love his wife," not wives: so that polygamy is not even supposed by the exhortation, to exist among Christians. Mystery. (32.) The Vulgate, or the old Latin version, exclusively used by the church of Rome, renders this, sacrament; which is the only scriptural reason, or shadow of reason, for the absurdity of numbering marriage among the sacraments, even while that Church considers the married state inconsistent with high attainments in holiness, forbids its priests to marry, and discourages marriage in various other ways! Many have enlarged on this mystery, namely the appointment of marriage in the garden of Eden, as a type or emblem of Christ and his Church; (for so they understand the passage.) The following quotation gives the substance of ancient and modern expositions of the passage in this particular. 'Adam, in whom the whole human 'race began, was a natural image of Christ, in whom the 'human race was to be restored: and his deep sleep, the 'opening of his side, and the formation of Eve of a rib 'taken out of his side, were fit emblems of Christ's death, 'of the opening of his side on the cross, and of the rege'neration of believers by his death. The love which 'Adam expressed towards Eve, and his union with her 'by marriage, were lively emblems of Christ's love to 'believers, and of his eternal union with them in one so'ciety after the resurrection. And Eve herself, who was 'formed of a rib taken from Adam's side, was a natural 'image of believers, who are regenerated, both in their 'body and mind, by the breaking of Christ's side on the 'cross. These circumstances we may suppose to prefigure 'that great event; and, by prefiguring it, to show that it 'was decreed of God from the beginning.' (Macknight.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14.

Wicked men follow the example of their father the devil, and may be known as his progeny. Surely then the beloved children of God should imitate his holiness, and should especially walk in love with their brethren, their neighbours, and even with their enemies, as Christ hath loved them. The perfection and obligations of this example are infinite; so that there is no kind or degree of self-denying, liberal, or forgiving love, to which it will not direct and animate the grateful believer. We should always keep our character in mind, and inquire whether this or the other conduct "becometh saints:" this will teach us, not only that gross sensualities or avarice are utterly inconsistent with this relation to our God; but that every inexpedient indulgence, and every degree of selfishness, is to be avoided. It is not enough to avoid all filthiness and foolish talking; even witty and ingenious repartees, which would ensure applause, must be repressed, with great self-denial, when they in the least infringe upon purity, piety, or charity, and are unsuitable to the Christian's profession. Our social intercourse should be conducted in another manner, in subserviency to mutual improvement: which will best be promoted by declaring the loving kindness of the Lord, and in celebrating his praises. But we must not only specify what practices are wrong; in many things we must insist upon it, that they who do them have no inheritance in the kingdom of Christ; and warn men not to be deceived with vain words, and so emboldened to those crimes for which "the wrath "of God cometh on the children of disobedience;" that they may be put on their guard, and refuse to be partakers with them. The darkness of paganism, and even that of many nominal Christians, may seem to accord with such practices; but they, who profess the Gospel, should consider themselves as "light in the Lord;" and if they indeed are the children of light, the Spirit of God will lead them far from all such scenes, and cause them to bring forth the fruit of goodness, righteousness, and truth. Yet even they need exhortations to walk in the light, and to prove more fully "what is acceptable to the Lord;" to avoid all degrees of fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, and boldly to protest against them by word and deed; to let the light of their holy conversation so shine before men, that sinners may be convicted in their own consciences, even in respect of those secret crimes, of which it is a shame to speak, write, or preach, in a particular manner. For the holy converse and conduct of a consistent Christian, is of the nature of light; it manifests that the contrary conduct of others is inexcusable; and his very silence is often most emphatically eloquent. After the example therefore of prophets and apostles, we should call on those, who are asleep and dead in sin, to awake and arise, that Christ may give them light: and the Lord will employ such warnings and invitations, to quicken with life from the death of sin whom he will: even as he uses the further instructions of his ministers, to guide awakened persons in the paths of peace and holy obedience.

V. 15—20.

By the light of divine truth we should walk with accuracy and circumspection; redeeming our time from sloth, needless sleep, or recreation, and impertinent visits, for useful and important purposes; because life, health, liberty, and the use of our senses and understandings, are at all times uncertain. The world also is full of misery and iniquity; and there is "no work nor counsel in the grave, "whither we are going." Let us then acquaint ourselves with the will of our Lord, attend to his work, and wait for his coming. Thus we shall practically show our wisdom, while many prove their folly by talking about religion, without knowing or doing the will of Christ.— When we are afflicted or wearied, let us not procure a vain exhilaration by any degree of intemperance, which is hateful and pernicious, and ends in deeper dejection; but, by fervent prayer, let us seek to be filled with the Spirit, and to be satisfied with his holy consolations; and let us avoid whatever might grieve our gracious Comforter. Thus we shall be animated to "speak to each other in "Psalms, and Hymns, and spiritual songs;" and, at least, with the melody of a grateful heart, to give thanks always, for all things, to our God and Father, in the name of his beloved Son, and thus anticipate the joys of heaven in the communion of the saints on earth.

V. 21—33.

If we all were subject one to another in the fear of God, and according to our several relations in life, society would appear like a well-organized body, and every individual would share the advantages. Every relative duty should be enforced by evangelical motives and examples.—The most entire submission of wives to their own husbands will be no infringement of their liberty, if performed for the Lord's sake, and after the example of the Church's obedience to him: especially if husbands also love their wives, after the pattern of Christ's love to his chosen people. He died for them, that he might sanctify and cleanse them, to be to him for an honour and praise to all eternity, and that he might be glorious in making them happy.—While we adore, and rejoice in, this condescending love, and press forward to that perfect holiness which is intended for us; and while we reverence both the mystery of this sacred union with the Lord, as members of his body, of his flesh, and of his bones; and his loving authority over us, who nourisheth and cherisheth us, as a man doth his own flesh; let husbands hence learn how to love their wives, and to show themselves justly entitled to superiority by wisdom, joined with tender sympathy and patient care; and let wives hence learn to obey and reverence their husbands. If the original appointment of marriage, and the subject before us, were duly attended to, all harshness, tyranny, and unfaithfulness, must be excluded; for no man hateth his own flesh: and on the other hand, all contests for superiority, and unreasonable attachment to humour and inclination, as interfering with cheerful obedience, would be prevented. In short, were Christianity general, and Christians more attentive to the precepts of their Lord; harmony and affectionate confidence would sweeten domestic life, without any material interruption or alloy. But, as all are sinners, it behooves every individual to make many concessions and allowances, and to persevere in the duty of the relation, though attended with many a cross.—Thus the worst evils will be prevented; and even an offending or unbelieving partner may be won upon: whereas a retaliation of misconduct can only render disagreement perpetual, and tend to the most painful and disgraceful consequences.

NOTES.

CHAP. VI. V. 1—4. (Note, Ex. xx. 12.) The apostle next exhorted believers, who had parents living, to be obedient to them "in the Lord," for his sake, from gratitude to him, in obedience to his commands, and for the honour of his Gospel. This general exhortation was to be limited according to the ages and particular circumstances of children. Some, it is probable, had Gentile parents, and they ought not to obey them, when their commands contradicted those of Christ; yet it would be peculiarly incumbent on them to give up their own will in all things lawful, for the credit of Christianity. Obedience of children to parents, thus limited, is in itself equitable and reasonable, a debt due to the instruments of their existence, and the tender guardians of their infancy, and generally conducive to their good. Indeed, the sentiments of all nations coincide in this; and the law of God expressly commanded children to honour the persons and authority of both father and mother, and to requite their kindness, as they had opportunity and ability. This was placed in the decalogue as the first commandment of the second table, being the first of the relative duties, and the source of all the others; and a promise of long life in the land of Canaan was annexed to it, as given to the Israelites; which might be generally applied to Christians, and encourage them to expect temporal comfort and length of days, as a gracious recompense for their obedience unless the Lord should see good to reward it more liberally in another life. Indeed, it has been observed in every age, that they who were distinguished for filial obedience were remarkably prospered. The apostle also exhorted parents, (for though fathers are only mentioned, doubtless mothers also were intended,) to use their authority without rigour, lest their children should be discouraged, prejudiced against Christianity, or provoked to obstinacy and disobedience, which always would prove painful to the parents, and often ruinous to the children. The restraints, reproofs, and corrections of parents, ought therefore always to be used in a meek, affectionate, and forgiving disposition, while they diligently educated them in such a manner, and with such instructions, as might best initiate them in the knowledge of Christ and true religion, and gave them such friendly admonitions, as might guard them against the various snares of the world, and the temptations of Satan. In these exhortations the inferior relation is constantly mentioned first; perhaps because the duty of it is most contrary to corrupt nature: yet it ought to be attended to, even when the superiors neglect theirs. 'Make 'them to read the Scriptures, says Theophylact, which is 'the duty of all Christians: for is it not a shame to in'struct them in heathen authors, whence they may learn 'bad things, and not to instruct them in the oracles of 'God?' (Whitby.) This is an important remark: but immensely more is required, in catechizing and other instruction, in reproof, mild correction, example, conversation, watchfulness against every thing in word or deed unbecoming in the presence of children, seizing every opportunity of drawing their attention to the great truths and duties of religion, and illustrating the effects of wickedness, the love of God, the state of the world, &c. indeed immensely more, than can be even hinted at in a note, is implied in this brief exhortation.

V. 5—9. St. Paul next exhorts servants, who had embraced Christianity, to be obedient to their own masters according to the flesh, or to whom they were subjected in temporal matters. In general, the servants, at that time, were slaves, the property of their masters; and often treated with great severity, though seldom with modern cruelty. But the apostles were ministers of religion, not politicians: they had not that influence among rulers and legislators, which would have been requisite for the abolition of slavery; and in that state of society, as to other things, this would not have been expedient, as God did not please miraculously to interpose in the case; and they did not deem it proper to exasperate their persecutors, by expressly contending against the lawfulness of slavery.—Yet both the law of love and the Gospel of grace tend to its abolition; and the universal prevalence of Christianity must annihilate it, with many other evils, which in the present state of things cannot wholly be avoided. In the wisdom of God, the apostles were left to take such matters as they found them, and to teach servants and masters their respective duties; in the performance of which, the evil would be mitigated; till in due time it should be extirpated by Christian legislators. Servants were therefore taught to obey their masters, not only with a respectful attention to their persons and authority, and a fear of displeasing them, but with a jealous and trembling fear of offending and dishonouring God by an improper behaviour. This was to be done with a single desire and aim to please Christ, their great and gracious Master, whom they obeyed, in conscientiously serving even an unreasonable and tyrannical earthly master. They were also to do their work, not as eye-servants, who are diligent in their master's presence and slothful in his absence, being only desirous of pleasing man, but as the servants of God, who heartily did his will even in their secular employments. Then they would cheerfully and assiduously do service to their masters, as endeavouring to please the Lord, and not men, in so doing: being assured, that whatever good action any man did, from Christian principles, it would be graciously recompensed by the Lord; and that a poor slave would be as much accepted, in performing the duty of his place, as any free man in his apparently more important services. On the other hand, believing masters ought to act from the same principles, and in the same conscientious manner, towards their servants, whether they were Christians or not: exercising their authority with humanity and gentleness; not only without inflicting rigorous punishments, but also forbearing to menace or terrify their servants, or to express any haughty or excessive anger to them, even when most evidently faulty. For though the laws of man gave them great power in this respect, yet they must remember, that they were accountable to the great Lord and Master of all for their use of it; who will deal with men according to their conduct towards their inferiors, and expects his people to copy the example of his lenity and mercy. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 10—13. The apostle here concludes his practical instructions, by a figurative exhortation, taken from military affairs. As the soldiers of Christ, the Ephesians were called to fight under his banner, against Satan, the world, and sin: but they were too weak in themselves for this conflict, and must therefore "be strong in the Lord," by a continual reliance on his mighty power for protection, support, and assistance. In the fulness of Christ, and in the graces of the Spirit, a panoply, or complete suit of armour, was provided for every believer: this, the Lord, as it were, held out to them, that, receiving it from him, they might put it on daily, in a diligent and watchful use of the appointed means. Thus armed, they might be able to stand against the assaults of Satan, by whatever artful methods he, or his instruments, attempted to obstruct their progress. For they, and all Christians, were called to conflict and wrestle, not only against their own in-dwelling corruptions, the opposition of persecutors, the enticements of wicked men, and the allurements of the world, but also against those invisible and formidable principalities and powers, who ruled the darkness of this world; even Satan and his angels; the great authors of man's ignorance, impiety, and iniquity, all over the earth. These might be called "spiritual wickedness in high places," not only as they held their empire in the air, according to the general opinion, and tempted men to wickedness, especially in their religion; but also as being the authors of all idolatry. They became proud rebels and apostates even in heavenly places; and being spiritual wickednesses in that holy world, they were cast out from thence; and had from the beginning opposed man's entrance into heaven by every means, which malice, capacity, or sagacity, could suggest. It was therefore necessary for all engaged in this warfare to be completely armed for the conflict with such powerful and determined enemies; that they might be able to stand in the evil day of peculiar temptation, or persecution, or at the approach of death. They must be prepared every day for the conflict, and would continually be called to resist their foes: but some days would peculiarly encourage or give advantage to Satan's assaults; and as they could not know before-hand when such occasions would be afforded him, they must, as vigilant and valiant soldiers, be always ready. That, thus "withstanding in the evil day," and having done all expected from them, they might stand victorious on the field of battle, and be approved by their great Commander.

V. 14—17. The minds of Christian soldiers ought to be fortified and prepared for the assault, by conscious sincerity in their profession, and by truth in their whole conversation; as the loins of soldiers were girded by their military belt, when they marched out to the battle. "Righteousness," or an habitual and conscientious obedience to the various commandments of God, should be their breast-plate, which would defend them from fatal wounds in the day of conflict: whereas conscious negligence and disobedience would render them afraid to face persecution or death in the cause of Christ. To stand their ground in such difficult situations, or to march forward in such rugged paths, their feet must be "shod with the preparation of the Gospel of peace;" that is, their motives and encouragements to obedience, amidst temptations and persecutions, must be derived from a clear and comprehensive knowledge of the Gospel; through which God is revealed, as "in Christ reconciling the world unto himself," and actually at peace with every believer, notwithstanding past trangressions, and present defects and infirmities. This assurance would make obedience delightful, though self-denying, and animate the established believer to resist temptation, to endure tribulation, and to march through difficulties and enemies, in the cause of Christ and in the way to heaven. (Note, Deut. xxxiii. 25. Luke xv. 22.) Over all these faith must be placed as a shield: by crediting the testimony of God, realizing unseen objects, resting the soul on the promises, and relying on the power, truth, mercy, wisdom, grace, and providence of God, according to his word; they would be able to ward off the temptations of Satan, as soldiers received the darts of the enemy on their shields. The suggestions of the tempter would indeed often resemble darts, by the suddenness and violence with which they were injected, and fiery, or poisoned darts, by the fatal effects produced by them. For as poisoned darts would fatally inflame the blood of those wounded by them; so the suggestions of Satan would inflame the anger, pride, lust, avarice, or other corrupt propensities of the heart, unless immediately intercepted and extinguished by the shield of faith. This clause is often interpreted exclusively of those harassing temptations, by which hard thoughts of God, and horrid or desponding conclusions concerning themselves, are excited in men's minds: these lead to immense distress, and eventually to guilt; and faith in God's word must extinguish them: yet, probably, the apostle meant the words in a more comprehensive sense. To all this, Hope, or a scriptural expectation of victory and eternal glory, must supply the place of a helmet, to cover the head in the day of battle; by couteracting that discouragement, which doubtfulness of the event would induce, in times of sharp temptation: so that it might be called the helmet of salvation, as nothing could be courageously done without it. To complete the whole, the word of God must serve the Christian soldier for a sword: an exact and comprehensive acquaintance with its various doctrines, promises, precepts, warnings, and a readiness at recollecting, and adducing, pertinent texts upon every emergency, would drive the tempter to a distance, and procure a final victory over him. (Notes, Matt. iv. 1—11.) Thus the whole suit of armour would be complete: for no covering was provided for the back, as victory must be sought by valour, not by cowardice.

V. 18—20. To give all the rest their full efficacy to procure, keep bright, and put on this suit of armour, the soldiers of Christ must "pray always;" constantly, frequently, at stated times, in occasional ejaculations, and more abundantly in the prospect, or in the hour, of temptation; using all kinds of prayer and supplication, in dependence on the Holy Spirit, and according to his teaching and influences; and "watching unto it," against remissness, discouragement, weariness, interruptions, and unseasonable engagement: "with all perseverance;" seeing Satan would peculiarly tempt them to negligence in this matter, that he might obtain further advantages against them. They must also remember to help one another, and all the saints, by their prayers for them without distinction. Especially the apostle entreated their prayers for him, that he might have opportunity and liberty of spirit, boldly to declare his important message in the face of danger and death; for though he was Christ's ambassador of peace to the Gentiles, he was at that time executing his commission in confinement and in fetters: so greatly was his glorious Lord despised among men! He, however, did not regard this degradation, or feel any anxiety about his liberty, provided he were enabled to speak with becoming boldness, firmness, and impartiality, when called to bear testimony to the truth. The reader, who is acquainted with what hath been written on this subject, will perceive that, in some particulars, the exposition here given rather varies from that of approved writers. Perhaps zeal for particular doctrines sometimes renders pious men too apt to explain every expression in support of them; though it weakens the proof of them, makes one part of such passages coincide with the other by a needless repetition, and leaves out other matters equally important. Indeed, it may be apprehended, that by adducing every thing which can be thought of, in explaining such metaphors, many things are supposed to be contained in them, which were entirely out of the writer's mind when he penned them. Bonds. Or, in a chain. 'The apostle was allowed to live at 'Rome, with a soldier that kept him. To this soldier he 'was tied with a chain, fixed on his right wrist, and fas'tened to the soldier's left arm; and the chain being of a 'convenient length, the two could walk together with 'ease. The soldiers, who were thus employed, no doubt 'reaped great benefit from the apostle's conversation and 'preaching.' (Macknight.) This is probable, and the thought is worthy of attention; but the words, no doubt, imply more than we know on the subject.

V. 21—24. The apostle knew that the Ephesians would be anxious to know many things concerning him; but it was not requisite for him to write on that subject, as he had sent, with this epistle, a brother and minister competent to inform them, and to encourage and edify them by his converse and preaching. (Marg. Ref.) 'He wished the Ephe'sians, (as well as the Philippians and Colossians;) to know 'what success he had had in preaching at Rome, what 'opposition he had met with, what comfort he enjoyed 'under his sufferings, what converts he had made to 'Christ, and in what manner the evidences of the Gospel 'affected the minds of the inhabitants of Rome.' (Macknight.) The desire and prayer of the apostle was, that peace with God, their consciences, and each other, as connected with faith and love, and communicated from God the Father and the Lord Jesus, might abound to all the brethren. At the same time he gave them his apostolical blessing in such language, as showed that the grace or special favour and mercy of God would be on all them, and them only, who loved Christ, in sincerity, and in an uncorrupt and holy manner. (Note, 1 Cor. xvi. 21—24.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

The Gospel furnishes believers with most efficacious motives to all relative duties; and the law directs those, whom Christ hath redeemed from its curse, in what manner they may adorn his doctrine and show forth his praise; for all its commandments are right and beneficial. When children honour and obey their parents, they take a proper method to obtain temporal comfort and prosperity; and when they do it "in the Lord," it forms an evidence of their interest in his promises, which will be fulfilled in their everlasting felicity. Similar motives should induce parents to attend diligently to the education of their children, with meekness, prudence, and affection; that they may not provoke them to wrath, or tempt them to sin; but bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. But, alas, how sadly is this duty neglected, even among professors of the Gospel! How many parents, even among professed Christians, by their imprudence, violent passions, harshness, or unforgiving temper and conduct, disgust their children, prejudice them against religion, render them uncomfortable in their presence, and consequently disposed to prefer almost any other company! This does not excuse the children's disobedience; but it awfully occasions it. On the other hand, how commonly do we see more regard paid to every kind of instruction, or trifling embellishment, than to their religious principles and conduct! So that, too often, the education of children leads them to those habits, notions, or connexions, which make way for their subsequent ungodliness, infidelity, dissipation, licentiousness, or avarice, by which they ruin themselves, and propagate impiety, vice, and misery, in an accumulating progression. They who fear God, and love their children, should watch and pray, and even tremble, lest they should thus prove the occasion of condemnation to their own offspring; for though God alone can change the heart, yet he commonly does it by means of the good instructions and example of parents. and in answer to their fervent prayers. Whereas they, whose chief anxiety seems to be that their children may be wealthy, polite, and accomplished, whatever be the event to their souls, can have no ground to expect the blessing of God upon them. Few masters will refuse their approbation to the injunctions here laid upon their servants, or servants their approbation to the exhortations given to their masters: but, alas! they who ought to obey the precept are prone to object to it, or to explain it slightly.—The greater advantages, however, servants now enjoy, the more cheerfully should they yield obedience and perform service to their own masters; and the greater cautions should they use, not to dishonour the Gospel by a negligent, refractory, or unfaithful behaviour. They ought especially to avoid whatever may give plausibility to the imputation of their being mere eye- servants and men-pleasers, but should always act as in the fear of God, and with "good-will do service, as unto the Lord, and not unto "men." This will engage the servants of Christ to diligence in their work, even if their earthly masters behave ill to them, and it will sanctify all their employments, and secure them a gracious recompense from the Lord. The same principles will render masters considerate, kind, gentle, and conscientious in their whole deportment, remembering that they also have a Master in heaven, who is no respecter of persons. And what orderly and happy families will those be, where relative duties are thus attended to!

V. 10—17.

If we would serve the Lord in this evil world, we must depend on him for strength, as well as for instruction, and a merciful acceptance. Our enemies indeed are mighty, and we are without strength; but our Redeemer is almighty, and in the power of his might we may overcome all that oppose our course. Let us then daily put on the armour which the Captain of our salvation hath prepared for us; that, being sober and vigilant, and always ready for the battle, we may be "able to stand against all the wiles of "the devil." The potent rulers of the darkness of this world, who wrought spiritual wickedness in heaven, will oppose our march to that inheritance which they have lost, and endeavour to bring us to that hell to which they are condemned. They often have powerful allies in the principalities of the earth, and wicked men always fight under their banner; but our flesh, the corrupt nature, the traitor in the camp, is our most dangerous foe; while fear o present suffering, and desire of present gratification, continually war against our souls. We must therefore engage in this warfare as men in earnest, continually expecting the onset of our foes, either by open violence, or deep-laid stratagems. Some fiery darts will every day be thrown at us, to inflame our passions or distress our hearts; but evil days of peculiar danger and difficulty must be expected, and we shall not be able to withstand in them, and, having done all, to stand as conquerors before our Captain, unless we be habitually armed for the fight. The soldier, who is secure in the enemy's country, will probably be assaulted and shamefully worsted when he least expects it. (Notes, &c. 2 Sam. xi. Matt. xxvi. 40—43. 69—75.) Habitual sincerity in professing and obeying the truth, and uprightness towards God and man, must be the girdle of our loins, and the breast-plate in this important warfare; but then "our feet must also be shod with the preparation of the "Gospel of peace." In the constant exercise of vigorous faith and lively hope, we shall possess our impenetrable shield and helmet of salvation; while with "the sword of "the Spirit," even the word of truth, we may drive our enemies before us, and seek the victory for ourselves and our fellow combatants. Thus armed and praying always with all earnestness by the Spirit, and watching thereunto with all perseverance," we shall be made "more "than conquerors, through him that loved us."

V. 18—24.

All the saints are our fellow-soldiers in our spiritual warfare, though divided into different battalions, distinguishable by a few unimportant externals, and we must help them all with our supplications; for general success against the powers of darkness, as well as personal victory, should be our noble ambition. But all Christians are bound in a peculiar manner to pray for the ministers of the Gospel, as they are exposed to the special rage of the enemy: when they fall, it is "as when a standard-bearer "fainteth," and their honourable conduct is of the greatest importance to the triumph of the Gospel. Those ministers especially, who are exposed to great hardships and perils in their work, have a claim to the prayers of their brethren. For the ambassadors of peace from the Lord to his rebellious creatures have often been cast into prison, and put to death as criminals! It is peculiarly desirable that utterance should be given them in perilous situations, that they may boldly declare the mystery of the Gospel: for the more boldly they speak, in consistency with the meekness of wisdom and love, the better do they perform their work. Men of this stamp rather desire to make full proof of their ministry, than to enjoy personal ease or liberty; their own affairs will be inconsiderable in their judgment, compared with the success of the Gospel. They will, however, greatly rejoice to have beloved brethren and faithful ministers, who are able to comfort and establish the people in their absence; and while they wish for peace, with faith and love, to all that profess the Gospel, they must also remind them that grace will be with all them, and them only, who "love the Lord Jesus Christ "in sincerity."

THE
PHILIPPIANS.

The manner in which the apostle and his associates were led to pass over from Asia into Europe, and to begin their labours at Philippi, in Macedonia; as well as their success, and the persecution by which Paul and Silas were driven thence, have been already considered. (Notes, Acts, &c. xvi.) The apostle had once afterwards visited Philippi, though few particulars are recorded. (Note, Acts xx. 1—6.) As this epistle was, manifestly, written from Rome, and during the latter part of the apostle's first imprisonment in that city; nearly twelve years had passed since he first preached at Philippi: but the conduct of the Christians there had uniformly been so exemplary, and their grateful affection to him so fully evinced, that he had only to rejoice over them with heartfelt gratitude, while he poured out his prayers for them; and affectionately animated them to persevere and press forward in their heavenly course. Some cautions indeed, against deceivers of different descriptions, whose base conduct and awful doom he declares in most expressive terms, are joined with his exhortations. Not one censure, however, is passed, or implied, on any of the Philippians; but unqualified commendation and confidence. (Note, Rev. ii. 8—11.) It is evident, that Epaphroditus, who had been sent with a supply of money to the apostle at Rome; and who seems to have been a pastor, and perhaps the principal pastor, of the Church, conveyed the epistle to Philippi. He had, either by his journey to Rome, or by his zealous labours, in assisting the apostle, when in that city, brought a dangerous sickness upon himself; the tidings of which so afflicted the Philippians, and their sorrow, when made known to Epaphroditus, so distressed him; that the apostle was induced to send him back sooner than he had intended, though to his own inconvenience. The subjects treated on, and the instructions to be deduced from them, need not be anticipated. (Note, ii. 24—30.) It is undeniable, that the epistle was not sent long before the two years of the apostle's imprisonment at Rome were ended; which the Oxford Bible supposes to have taken place about the close of A. D. 65. According to this, I have dated the epistle, (though many fix an earlier date for it,) on a full conviction, that more years were spent in the various labours of this great apostle, than are generally supposed; yet, at the same time, not considering the subject as of great importance.

CHAP. I.

The apostle addresses the Philippians, 1, 2: showing his thankfulness to God for their fellowship in the Gospel to that time; his love to them; and his confidence in them, as to the future, 3—8; and states the blessings for which he prayed in their behalf, 9—11. He informs them, that his imprisonment at Rome had conduced to the furtherance of the Gospel, 12, 13: so that many had been rendered more bold in preaching it; in which he greatly rejoices, though some did it from corrupt motives, 14—18; knowing that this will turn to his salvation, and trusting that Christ will be magnified in his body, whether by life or death, 19, 20. He declares that he is prepared for either event; that to depart and be with Christ would be far better for him; but that, as his life would be useful to them, he doubts in his choice, and supposes that he shall live, and be set at liberty, that he may further their joy of faith, by coming to them, 21—26. He exhorts them to walk worthy of their profession; to be of one mind, in striving for the gospel; and to suffer cheerfully for Christ, as they had already been called to do, 27—30.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1. As St. Paul's apostleship had never been called in question at Philippi, and as he wrote this epistle not only in his own name, but in that of Timothy who was then at Rome with him, he styles himself and Timothy the servants of Christ. He addressed himself to "the saints at Philippi, with the bishops and deacons:" hence we learn that the distinction between bishops and presbyters was not then generally established; but that the pastors of the Church were distinguished from the deacons, who managed the secular matters and the charities of the Church. (Notes, Acts vi. 1—7. xx. 17—28. 1 Tim. iii. 1—7.) Much labour and learning have, indeed, been employed to set aside this conclusion; but with little success, even by the allowance of decided Episcopalians. 'Though it be generally resolved, that the 'word bishop and elder are equivalent in scripture; yet 'this is not to be understood so that either, or both of 'them, signifies indifferently those whom we now call 'presbyters; but that they both signify bishops, one settled 'in each Church by the apostles, there being no use of 'the second order in the Church, till the numbers of 'believers increased.' (Hammond.) Beyond doubt, the apostle ordained more than one, either bishops or presbyters, in some of the churches. (Marg. Ref.) But this learned expositor did not perceive that one bishop, without any presbyters under him, comes to precisely the same thing, as one presbyter, without any bishop over him. Till the churches were multiplied, the bishops and presbyters were the same; but afterwards, probably in the times of the apostles, the senior or more eminent presbyter was called episcopus, or overseer, not of the Church only, but also of its pastors.

V. 3—6. The converstion and subsequent good conduct of the Philippians never occurred to the apostle's mind, (and they would occur very frequently,) without animating him to thank God in their behalf; so that "always, in every prayer of his," secret or social, he made request for them, with such lively emotions of joy, as helped to solace him in his confinement. He thanked God for their fellowship in the Gospel, and its blessings, from the first day of their conversion to that present time, (which was about twelve years,) without having turned aside or grown remiss in their profession. (Note, 1 Cor. i. 4—9.) He was therefore confident, that he, even God the Spirit, who had begun the good work of sanctification in their souls, would carry it on, and perform it, till the perfection of their redemption in body and soul, at the day of Christ. Some learned men render the words here translated "fellowship in the gospel," communication towards the gospel; and understand them of the liberality which the Philippians had shown towards the apostle.—But this, in itself, was a cause of gratitude to God vastly inferior to the conversion of very many souls, to partake of all the blessings and salvation of Christ; the sentiment is not at all in the apostle's manner in other epistles, or even in the other parts of the epistle, where he mentions that subject openly and perspicuously; the word κοινωνια, far more frequently at least, means participation, than communication; and even when it has the latter meaning, it implies that the giver made the receiver his partner, or a sharer with him in his abundance; and

These are nearly all the places in which this word, and those from the same root, occur in the New Testament; and it is evident that in most places it means partnership, or participation; and in the rest implies such a communication as admits others to share with the givers. 'To have all things common, 'κοινα.' (Leigh.) In not one of them does it clearly denote a number of persons joining together to raise a sum of money; as has been in this place interpreted, both in ancient and modern times, though it evidently enervates and obscures the sense. The day, &c. (6.)—'The Spirit of God will not desert us to the end, until 'even our mortal bodies, being restored to life and glori-'fied, shall stand in judgment before Christ.' (Beza.)—

V. 7, 8. Many who had made a credible profession of Christianity afterwards fell away, having "no root in "themselves;" yet it was meet for the apostle to hope better things of the Philippians, and to be satisfied that a good work of new creation had indeed been wrought upon them; for their long continued consistency of conduct had given them a peculiar place in his heart; or, as it may be rendered, they had shown that they had had him in their hearts, and had abundantly evinced their love to Christ by their kindness to his afflicted servant. During his imprisonment they had cordially sympathized with him, and endeavoured to alleviate his sufferings; and in all that he undertook for the defence and confirmation of the Gospel, they had concurred with him, and shown themselves partakers of the same grace which had been bestowed upon him, acting from the same holy principles, and returning his love with reciprocal affection. Indeed, God was witness how greatly he longed after them, with a holy, tender, and compassionate affection, like that of Christ to his people; how he longed to see them, and how gladly he would exert himself in any self-denying services, by which he might be further useful to them in their spiritual concerns.

V. 9—11. The apostle next gave the Philippians a compendious account of his constant prayers for them.—He was confident that they were true believers, and "loved the Lord Jesus in sincerity; and he therefore prayed that love of him, his cause, people, truths, and ordinances, of the holy character, law, and government of God, and of all men for his sake, might "abound more "and more," in all its varied exercises and happy effects; and that it might be regulated by an enlarged and exact knowledge of divine things; and by that sound judgment, which was the result of a holy relish for spiritual excellency, a matured discernment in the various parts of religion, and deep experience of its power in their own hearts. For when these concur, they enable the Christian to judge, as it were, extempore, in a variety of cases; even as the healthy eye distinguishes objects, the ear sounds, and the palate meats. Thus false affections, unjustifiable measures and enthusiasm, would be prevented, and all those evils into which vehement zeal, without proportionable knowledge and judgment, betrayed men, to the scandal of the Gospel and the division of the Church; and their abundant love would be directed in forming and executing designs of extensive usefulness. He further prayed, that they might be enabled to distinguish things that differed, and so to guard against counterfeit revelations, false affections, and all those specious errors and evils, by which Satan and his ministers imposed upon the unwary; thus they would choose and "approve things that "were excellent," and reject others, however plausibly stated. The marginal reading, "Try," or prove things "which differ," seems more exact than that inserted in the text. (Marg. Ref.) He also prayed that they might be "sincere," not only as true believers, but as uncorrupted with base alloy, whether of false doctrine, superstition, or a worldly spirit and conduct. The original word is taken from any transparent object being held in the light of the sun, by which every mote or atom of dross becomes visible. The word sincere, derived from the Latin, is mel sine cerâ, honey without wax, or entirely pure and unmixed. If the Philippians were thus sincere, the apostle trusted, that, according to his prayers for them, they would be "without offence, &c.;" neither stumbling at the scandals laid in their way by others, nor misleading or grieving their brethren, or causing their neighbours to stumble at the word by their misconduct; for both the active and passive sense may be implied. Accordingly, he further prayed that each of them might be thus upheld, till he should honourably finish his course; and even that the Church of Philippi might be thus preserved through successive generations, until the day of Christ: and that "trees of righteousness, the planting of the LORD," might not only be in some measure fruitful; but that they might resemble those trees, which are laden with fruit on every bough; being filled with all holy tempers, all kinds of good works, all the fruits of the Spirit, through every day of their future lives, in the full improvement of their talents, and according to the duties of their several relations. For these good fruits would not only be beneficial to men, and eventually advantageous to themselves; but, through Christ, as the effects of his grace, and accepted through his mediation, they would redound to the praise and honour of God, adorning and recommending the Gospel, silencing gainsayers, and bringing sinners to glorify God in the obedience and worship of faith.
